The South Pass in 1838 was 11.3 miles long, 700 feet wide, except at the extremities, and 8 feet deep on the crest of the bar. In 1875 it was about the same length and width, but only 7 feet deep on the crest of the bar. In 1874 a board of engineers consisting of three Army engineers, three civil engineers, and one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey was appointed to devise and determine upon some plan of securing deep-water navigation through one or more of the passes. This board, after visiting Europe and examining many works there involving similar problems, recommended, in January, 1875, the improvement of the South Pass by means of jetties. In pursuance of this recommendation Congress, in March, 1875, conferred the task of making the improvement upon James B. Eads and associates. The jetties were practically built on lines recommended by the board.

The original act provided for a channel 30 feet deep and 350 feet wide, but by 1878 it became evident that such a channel could not be obtained by the work then laid out, and accordingly Congress was induced to remit, by acts passed in 1878 and 1879, the requirement to a channel 200 and 250 feet wide and 26 feet deep, and on this basis the work was deemed completed in July, 1879. In making the improvement, and as a part of it, training dikes were built at the head of the pass, and mattress sills were laid at the head of the Southwest Pass and Pass a Loutre In 1891 the west end of Pass a Loutre sill was carried away, and a large break occurred on the west bank of Pass a Loutre about 1½ miles below the head of the South Pass.

This break, although several attempts have been made to close it, has not yet been closed, and in consequence thereof, as well as on account of the loss of the contiguous end of the Pass a Loutre mattress sill and portions of the training dikes, and lack of repair and maintenance in some of the training dikes, the inflow of water into the South Pass has been less than before, which has, no doubt, to some extent detracted from the scouring force in the pass, necessitating some dredging for the maintenance of the requisite channel. Before these drawbacks occurred the pass received from 10 to 11 per cent of the water in the main stream; since then only 7 per cent. Three hundred feet of the jetties at the sea end have been washed away on both sides, and in addition to this 150 feet of the jetty on the west side. None of the jetties thus washed away has been replaced. The east dike at the head of the pass has also been washed away. This was a training dike 1,250 feet long, and has never been replaced.

There is also an open and exposed gap 1,100 feet long between the end of the Pass a Loutre mattress sill and the end of the bank or dike on the east side of the pass. The gap was, when the work was completed, filled with a training dike. Five hundred feet of the mattress sill in Southwest Pass have also been carried away. In short, neither the jetties nor the training dikes nor mattress sills have been kept up to the condition they were in 1879, but have been allowed to diminish and deteriorate.

Up to 1889 the channel was maintained at the required depth substantially without dredging. Since that time it has deteriorated and has not been maintained without considerable dredging. During the year ending June 30, 1896, there were 169 days of dredging. Within the last four years there has been an average of 100 days' dredging each year. The channel was not kept at the required depth for 47 days during the year 1897. On the whole, it appears that, although the jetties have accomplished much good and great results, they have not wholly succeeded, owing to the causes enumerated, in maintaining the fine channel that existed from 1879 to 1889. To maintain the good results then obtained the dikes, sills, and jetties carried away should be replaced or restored as far as practicable. Besides, the jetties should be extended seaward farther than originally built in order to keep pace with the extension of the bar into the Gulf.

Jetties are the artificial extensions of the natural banks of the stream, and as the bed of the stream is, from the silt moving in the river, prolonged into the Gulf the jetties must of necessity keep pace with such extension. For practical purposes the pass is not adequate for vessels drawing over 24, or at most 25, feet of water. This is insufficient for the wants of modern commerce. Vessels drawing from 27 to 30 feet and over are now quite common and much more economical than small vessels. It is very doubtful whether a channel sufficient for this larger class of vessels can be obtained in the South Pass. Maj. Quinn maintains that it can. Engineer Donovan, with a 20-year acquaintance with the pass, maintains that it can not.

Your committee visited the pass in February last and with a 26-foot channel found the pass bank full at all points. Unless the pass can absorb much more water the scouring process can not be increased or a deeper channel obtained by that method. To secure a greater volume of water it would be necessary to build and prolong great training dikes at the head of the pass and to fortify them with mattress sills and other works, so as to bring about a larger inflow. In the next place, it would be necessary to build strong and extensive levees on both sides of the pass from the head to the jetties. There is scarcely sufficient foundation for such levees. The earth and riprapping would have to be brought from a great distance, and the embankment would be subject, more or less, to the storms, the waves, and the backwash of the Gulf. In short, such leveeing would be an extensive and most expensive jettying from the head of the pass to deep water in the Gulf. These are some of the difficulties which occur even to the lay mind. To say the least, the cost would be enormous and the result very problematical.

But the commerce of the Mississippi Valley asks and is entitled to a much deeper and broader channel to the sea than that now afforded or likely to be afforded by the South Pass. The Southwest Pass is regarded in many quarters—lay and expert—as the cheapest and most feasible route through which to obtain the requisite deep-water navigation. Congress has already made provision for a thorough examination and survey of this route. The engineers having the work in charge have not yet made their report, and until they do it would be premature for us to suggest or advise. We may add that to improve the Southwest Pass and at the same time to maintain and utilize the South Pass, thus securing the advantages of two passes, is no novelty.

This plan was adopted in 1853, when provision was made and work carried on for the improvement of both the Southwest Pass and Pass a Loutre. In case of extensive repairs or accidents there would always be one pass open and available for navigation. (See Maj. Quinn, Testimony, 443–463; Engineer Donovan, Testimony, 466–482; Engineer Ockerson, Testimony, 463–465; also his article on "The problem of deep-water navigation through the passes," etc.; also Testimony, 440–443, 483–490, 493–503.)

MISSOURI RIVER AND MISSOURI RIVER COMMISSION.

In respect to the Missouri River Commission and its work, we beg leave to state that it has had charge of the river from Sioux City to its mouth, and that its work in recent years has been chiefly confined to the improvement of the navigability of some 45 or 46 miles of the lower reach of the river and to so-called harbor improvements for the protection of the river fronts of towns from the inroads of the river on the other reaches of the river. The work done has no doubt been beneficial for the purposes intended, and the money appropriated has, under the limitations stated, been judiciously expended.

The Missouri River is so eccentric and uncertain that great difficulties are encountered in controlling its movements from year to year, and nothing but systematic and patient effort can avail in its improvement. The commission has recommended in all its reports the improvement of the river by reaches, commencing at the mouth, and the work done under this system has proved eminently successful; but Congress has unfortunately permitted the appropriations for the general improvement of the river to be diverted to local improvements, which, being isolated and unsupported, are usually swept away by the annual overflows.

The condition of the river, by reason of the failure to adopt systematic and continuous improvement by reaches, as recommended by the commission, has been so bad as to discourage navigation, the rates of insurance upon boats and cargoes being absolutely prohibitory.

Your committee is of opinion that, in view of the great agricultural wealth of the country through which the Missouri River flows, and especially the enormous production of grain, the river should be so improved as to afford every facility for its navigation by boats and barges, so as to prevent excessive charges by railroads and also to make lower rates for transportation. If the system recommended by the commission could be faithfully adhered to for a few years, the river would be put in such condition as would induce the presence of steamboats and barges, so as to render it impossible for railroads to monopolize freights.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY (H. DOC. NO. 1793).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by the acts of Congress approved March 4, 1915, and February 28, 1916, I transmit herewith the report of the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the period from March 25, 1913, to October 31, 1916.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 21, 1916.

MENTAL HYGIENE AND RURAL SANITATION DIVISIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2215) to provide divisions of mental hygiene and rural sanitation in the United States Public Health Service, which was reported by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine. That Senator is now detained from the Senate on account of sickness.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator move to take up the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I can not move to take it up at this time.

Mr. WORKS. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time. I expect to have something to say about it when it comes up, but I am not prepared to have it taken up now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the Senator desired to make a statement in reference to the bill, but I did not understand that he desired to prevent its consideration.

Mr. WORKS. I expect to discuss the bill when it comes up, and I object to its present consideration.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS (S. DOC. NO. 641).

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. CHILTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the conference report on House bill 407 be now taken from the desk and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 407) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES. Has the report been read, Mr. President?

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report has heretofore been read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that it be again read. It has been read so long since that I presume none except those who are on the committee know what the contents of the report are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the report.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

"The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 407) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, and 10, and agree to the same.

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 3, line 12, after the word 'areas,' insert the following: 'of the character herein described'; and the Senate agree to the same.

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of section 9 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 9, line 22, after the word 'lands,' add the following:

"'Provided further, That such driveways shall not be of greater number or width than shall be clearly necessary for the purpose proposed and in no event shall be more than 1 mile in width for a driveway less than 20 miles in length, not more than 2 miles in width for driveways over 20 and not more than 35 miles in length and not over 5 miles in width for driveways over 35 miles in length: Provided further, That all stock so transported over such driveways shall be moved an average of not less than 3 miles per day for sheep and goats and an average of not less than 6 miles per day for cattle and horses.'

"And the Senate agree to the same.

"On page 2, line 22, after the word 'appeal,' add the following: 'but no right to occupy such lands shall be acquired by reason of said application until said lands have been designated as stock-raising lands.'

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. JONES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to make any remarks upon this bill or to oppose the conference report, but I desire to detain the Senate for a few moments on another subject, and I thought I would take advantage of this opportunity and occupy the attention of the Senate for 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection, and I will yield the floor to the Senator from Kansas for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it was my desire to be recognized at the conclusion of the remarks of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on Tuesday last; but I was temporarily called out of the Chamber. When I returned, another Senator was occupying the floor, and when he concluded it was too late for me to be recognized. Later in the afternoon several Senators on this side, myself included, who desired to speak upon the bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia gave way, believing and hoping that we would get a final vote upon the measure that afternoon.

In the course of the debate there were statements made upon the floor of the Senate that I feel I should bring to the attention of the Senate so that they may know the facts. First, I desire to direct the attention of the Senate to a remark of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. I am satisfied that the Senator from New Jersey did not intentionally desire to misrepresent conditions in the city of Topeka when, quoting from a book of statistics, he made the following statement:

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Topeka, which had a population of 40,000 inhabitants, approximately——

Mr. THOMPSON. The population is a little more than that, I think.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. A little more possibly now; but during the month of September, 1913, there were imported into the city of Topeka 90,062 gallons of whisky, to say nothing of beer. How does the Senator account for that if Kansas is a prohibition State?

Mr. President, I wired to the county clerk at Topeka, who has charge of matters of this kind, and I received from him a telegram in reply. I believe the Senate should know the facts, and, therefore, I desire to have the Secretary read the telegram from the county clerk, who has charge of the records as to the shipment of intoxicating liquors into Topeka.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., December 20, 1916.

HON. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Answering telegram concerning liquor shipments into Topeka during September, 1913, the statement on the floor of the Senate is the same misstatement that has been bandied about by the liquor leagues and brewers in every wet and dry fight from Washington, D. C., to State of Washington last three years. Have to-night made compilation of receipts according to reports of all express and railroad companies for September complete. The 2,823 shipments totaled 29,079 gallons, of which 26,404 were beer and the balance other liquors, as whisky, wine, and alcohol, an average of 1.6 gallons per inhabitant. Have written 100 letters denying this same story and proving the records.

O. K. SWAYZE, County Clerk.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I am satisfied that the Senator from New Jersey did not quote from the book of statistics which he consulted with the intention of misrepresenting the extent to which intoxicating liquors were used in Topeka in the month of September, 1913, but the figures given are not correct; they greatly misrepresent that city, and they are so far beyond the truth and so greatly exaggerated that I fear they were supplied by the saloon interests. They have been denied many times, and the true figures have been given by the county clerk of Shawnee County, Kans., who, as I have said, has had charge of the shipments of such liquors into Topeka. The records are open to the public, and there is no excuse for the publication of such untrue figures.

It will be seen from this message that the figures quoted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] as to whisky are thirty times greater than the official report shows, and do the city of Topeka a great injustice, and those who continue to publish these false reports should be condemned by all lovers of truth and honesty.

On page 560 of the RECORD I read the following, the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] having the floor:

When that law went into effect the illiteracy of the State was 49 per cent.

I am afraid my colleague was given the wrong data as to the illiteracy in Kansas in 1880.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. The census for that year shows that only——

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Just a minute—when I conclude the sentence. The census for that year shows that only 3.6 per cent of the people of Kansas were unable to read, and only 5.6 per cent were unable to write.

I yield to my colleague.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I will say that I intended, when the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] should be present, to call attention to various things that were said in connection with the discussion the other day. I have sent for the Senator, but I understand that he is unable to come this morning.

I think likely the statement I made as to the illiteracy in Kansas during saloon days is too high. I certainly do not want to make it appear that even under the saloons my State was more illiterate than it actually was. The figures I quoted were taken from the speech of Gov. Stubbs at Chicago, and from various speeches that were made in Topeka last January, when the last indebtedness of the State was paid. I had my secretary telephone to the Census Bureau with the idea of finding out as nearly as possible the exact situation as to illiteracy in Kansas during the saloon days and since that time.

There are no returns in the Census Bureau relative to illiteracy in Kansas from 1860 to 1870; hence I can give no figures from that department. In 1880, however, the illiteracy in that State was 5.6 per cent as shown by the figures in the Census Bureau. In 1890 it was 4 per cent. In 1900 it was 2.9 per cent, and in 1910 it was 2.2 per cent. So it shows, as I contended in my argument the other day, that the condition is gradually growing better under prohibition, and we have increased in literacy over 100 per cent since 1880, as shown by the figures in the Census Bureau.

Mr. CURTIS. I judge from the remarks of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that in the excitement of debate he unintentionally made statements in regard to conditions in Kansas which he would not have made upon a little more consideration. On page 561 I read the following from the remarks of the Senator from Missouri.

I remember a good many years ago trying a case in a court which was presided over by the Senator's distinguished father, I think, in a small town in Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. At Hiawatha.

Mr. REED. At Hiawatha. It seemed to me that there was not a lawyer at the bar who was not a common drunkard, and they had prohibition there, but it did not prohibit.

I was sorry that the junior Senator from Missouri should have made such a statement about the lawyers of Hiawatha. I did not know the lawyers there 25 years ago, but I have known all the lawyers there since 1898, and I know, regardless of their age or politics, that they are able lawyers, clean, honorable, sober, and upright men, and the people of Hiawatha are a law-abiding, industrious, sober people; and the county is dry and has been for many, many years.

The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] makes another statement which can not be established, and which is a slander on the State. I read from page 561:

I had a good deal of business for a good many years in Kansas, and I say now, without desiring to reflect upon the Senator's State, that there were more drunkards to the square acre in Kansas than in any place I ever was, and that, too, under a prohibitory law.

On the same page he says further:

I will make the assertion now that you will find as many drunken men in any city in Kansas as you will find in any city of the same size in Illinois, in Arkansas, in New York, or in Missouri.

Mr. President, I have just received a wire from Prof. Blackmar, of the Kansas University, which I desire to have read at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

LAWRENCE, KANS., December 20, 1916.

Senator CHARLES CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.:

As assistant attorney general, made careful investigation of liquor shipments into every county Kansas during year 1914. Average per capita shipment of all kinds of liquor, including alcohol, was 2.47 gallons. Allowing for consumption not recorded in shipments, the annual consumption did not exceed 3 gallons per capita. In same year average per capita consumption in United States was 22.5 gallons. In their vilification of Kansas, liquor advocates seem to have lost all standards of truth and honesty.

F. M. BLACKMAR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there no doubt was some drunkenness in some of the larger cities in Kansas for a few years after the law was first enacted in 1881, but I submit there never was a time in the State when the conditions were such as to justify the remarks of the junior Senator from Missouri; and if the State did have so much drunkenness in a few places, which I deny, he is not justified in making such remarks about the whole State.

I do not think any reasonable man, after having listened to the wire I have just had read, will believe the last remark made by the Senator from Missouri that there was as much liquor drunk in the cities of Kansas as in other cities in wet States. Such a statement as that can not be verified, and the facts do not warrant any assertion of that kind.

The very fact that the State of Oklahoma, to the south of Kansas, years after Kansas adopted prohibition and after the law had been tested in that State, adopted prohibition; the fact that Colorado, upon the west, some few years ago adopted prohibition; the further fact that Nebraska, on the north, and Kansas City, Mo., the home of the junior Senator from Missouri, went dry on November 7 last is the best evidence that the people who know Kansas and her conditions are willing to follow her lead.

The reports of the conditions existing in Kansas in 1915 and 1916 are not in my possession; but I have looked over the reports of 1914, and find that 28 counties in Kansas did not have a prisoner in jail during all that year; 48 counties did not send a prisoner to the penitentiary that year; 12 counties had not called a jury for the trial of a criminal case in a number of years; 20 counties did not have a prisoner in the State penitentiary; and in 1914 there were 740 prisoners in the State penitentiary, of whom 40 per cent were nonresidents of the State of Kansas. It seems to me that this record shows that the State of Kansas has but little crime and it is in splendid condition. We of Kansas believe that much of this is due to our prohibitory liquor law and its strict enforcement.

It is true, as stated by the junior Senator from Missouri, that our wonderful crops have brought to the State great wealth and prosperity; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the money derived from the sale of our great crops has been expended in the education of our boys and girls, in sending the young men and women to college, in buying more land, in making greater and better improvements, and in the purchase of stock and machinery, and it has not been expended for intoxicating liquor.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I contend that there is not a State in the Union to-day which can boast of a more honest, sober, orderly, liberty-loving, and law-abiding people than the State of Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, while I do not like to take up a matter in the absence of a Senator when he has made charges I desire to dispute, yet, having sent for the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and he not appearing, I feel at liberty to offer a telegram disputing the statement he made relative to the delivery of beer in Kansas City, Kans., my home town at the present time.

The charge was made that beer was being openly delivered there, and the implied charge, at least, that it was under some authority of the State or city. I stated at the time that that had been the source of a great deal of trouble, and that we had been endeavoring in every way to put it down, and finally resorted to the courts.

In answer to that charge, made by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I desire to send to the desk a telegram from the mayor of Kansas City, Kans., which I should like to have the Secretary read, and I believe, after it is called to the attention of the junior Senator from Missouri, that he will be fair enough to retract the statement he made in this respect at his first opportunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., December 20, 1916.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Liquor is not delivered by breweries, and there has not been a brewery wagon in Kansas City, Kans., since November, 1915. Breweries have been perpetually enjoined by the Supreme Court of Kansas from doing business in Kansas. Only beer delivered in Kansas City, Kans., is delivered by express companies upon bona fide orders given and paid for in Kansas City, Mo. Absolutely no agreement or arrangement with any brewery or anyone else for delivery of beer in Kansas City, Kansas City, Kans., has prosecuted 15 or 20 express companies and others for delivering illegal orders in Kansas City, Kans. Drunkenness has decreased in Kansas City, Kans., 80 per cent in the last five years, they getting drunk in Kansas City, Mo., and come across the State line into Kansas City, Kans.

C. W. GREEN, Mayor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Will my friend yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in listening in a somewhat haphazard way——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment?

Mr. STONE. I have a very brief statement to make.

Mr. THOMAS. I have yielded to the Senator from Missouri, because I suppose he wishes to say something with regard to the remarks of the Senators which have just been made. I am very anxious to get the conference report disposed of, and I trust that after the Senator from Missouri finishes we may be permitted to go on with it. If this is going to degenerate into a discussion of prohibition, I prefer that it should be postponed until after the conference report is disposed of.

Mr. STONE. My friend from Colorado has yielded to me, for which I am obliged, and if the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I wish merely to say that things which have been said and read have in some way referred to my colleague [Mr. REED]. I desire merely to state that my colleague has, as I am told, gone to New York to deliver an address to-night before an important body of men. Therefore he is absent; I simply wish that to be known.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, and Mr. THOMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I shall not yield to anyone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I would be delighted to yield to my friend the Senator from Kansas, but if we are going to make progress on the conference report we must proceed with it.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not want to make a speech. I merely wished to state that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was here a few minutes ago and answered to his name, and I suppose he is still about the building.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 407) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me about this report?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator from Washington as soon as I make a statement regarding my object in calling up the report of the conference committee on the bill for consideration at this time. It is due to the fact that if the bill becomes a law it will be necessary that some action should be taken here upon the report prior to the holiday recess so that the House will have opportunity to consider it before final adjournment.

The bill was discussed here, perhaps not as fully as it might have been, at the time or shortly after it was favorably reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and by unanimous consent it was passed by the Senate during the closing hours of the last session. It then went to the House, which at this session refused to accept the Senate amendment. The House therefore asked, and the Senate granted, a conference.

The conference committee, Mr. President, considered the bill at length and at several meetings, but was confronted with many difficulties, some of which at the time seemed insurmountable. There were two or three points of serious difference between us, which were, so far as they related to the amendments, finally reconciled by such changes in them as were accepted or receded from, as appear in the report.

The principal difficulty with regard to the amendments arose concerning the exemption from the operation of the act of land of the character covered by the bill for the establishment of what are called "driveways," and which are essential to the stockmen for the purpose of removing their animals from winter to summer ranges, and vice versa, and also for the purpose of making railway shipping points accessible to them. It was finally agreed that there might be withdrawn from these lands for such driveways of given length and width, the width being narrower as the length of the driveways was less, and arranging for a maximum of 5 or 6 miles in width for those exceeding 35 miles in length.

There were two provisions in the bill which encountered very serious objection in the Interior Department—the proviso to section 2, which is found on page 2, and all of section 9. It will be observed that section 9 contains an amendment of the Senate in striking out that clause which referred to the character of the land. The section itself provides for the purchase of not to exceed 320 acres of contiguous territory, by the occupant of a 320-acre tract, if valuable only for grazing, by paying to the United States $1.25 per acre therefor.

We could only overcome that objection by consenting to eliminate the section from the bill. In doing that the conference committee exceeded their authority, and unless what they have recommended shall be accepted by the Senate it can not insist upon its action here. It was, however, the only manner in which that objection could be eliminated, and we were conscious of the fact that unless it was eliminated the bill might not become a law.

The proviso of section 2 was another element of difficulty, and with the permission of the Senate I will read it in order to explain the amendment which has been offered:

Provided, That where any person qualified to make original or additional entry under the provisions of this act shall make application to enter any unappropriated public land which has not been designated as subject to entry (provided said application is accompanied and supported by properly corroborated affidavit of the applicant, in duplicate, showing prima facie that the land applied for is of the character contemplated by this act), such application, together with the regular fees and commissions, shall be received by the register and receiver of the land district in which said land is located and suspended until it shall have been determined by the Secretary of the Interior whether said land is actually of that character. That during such suspension the land described in the application shall not be disposed of; and if the said land shall be designated under this act, then such application shall be allowed; otherwise it shall be rejected, subject to appeal.

The purpose of that proviso is obvious. It gives the citizen the right to go upon what he determines to be land of this character before it is officially designated as such and perform those preliminaries of occupation which are made essential to entry; and then when the land is so designated such persons would have a prior right to it. To this proviso very earnest objections were made, some of which, to my mind, are substantial.

The amendment which we finally reported to this proviso simply provides that this procedure shall confer upon the locator no right whatever until the land has been properly designated. In other words, he acquires no equities by such occupation which can under any circumstances be used against the Government, but after the land has been so designated then his rights as a locator will begin.

Now, that is another amendment which we as a conference committee have no authority to make, and which can not prevail without the unanimous approval of the Senate. It seemed to us then, as it does now, that the success of the measure depends upon that report, and we therefore unanimously agreed to include it in the report to both Houses.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I received a protest the other day from some of my constituents against the bill on the ground that it permits stock men to take their stock through the land of homesteaders at will. Can the Senator inform me whether there is anything in the bill which permits anything of that kind?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; I do not think so. Of course, the Senator knows that live stock in the West must have different ranges in the summer and in the winter, and that stock in large bodies can only be moved slowly and must subsist upon the country during their passage from one point to another. The stockmen objected to this bill. They are opposed to it, since it is obvious that wherever land is withdrawn from the public range it is against the interest of the stockmen and limits their ranges to that extent. That is a very natural and a very human opposition, which all the various measures for settlement of the public domain are confronted with sooner or later. The purpose of the bill, however, is to meet the very solid objection that is universally applicable to that sort of land. It may shut the live stock from transport from one to another range and may make railroad points difficult or impossible of access. Therefore the amendment which is reported by the conference committee amending the amendment of the Senate provides that the department may withhold from occupation lands of the character described in the bill which may be necessary in its opinion for the purpose of securing these rights of way to the live-stock interests.

Mr. JONES. That is done before the land is entered by the homesteader.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

The proviso of section 2 is so amended that occupation of land prior to the designation of the land gives no right to such settler until the actual designation of the land by the department.

Mr. JONES. So it does not even pretend to interfere with the right of any settler who has already initiated those rights.

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all.

Mr. JONES. I examined the bill hurriedly, and I could not see anything of that sort, and I did not think anything of that kind could be done anyhow.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that the protest is based upon a misapprehension. I can readily see where if the proviso of section 2 were not amended some difficulty of that sort might arise through an inchoate right acquired under it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this bill is in rather a peculiar situation. A bill came from the House which was unsatisfactory to the Senate. It was amended by the Senate and made a little better in the judgment of the Senate. The report of the conference now emphasizes the bad features of the House bill, so that the conference report is less liberal than either the House bill or the bill as passed by the Senate, which endeavored to liberalize the measure.

Mr. President, it may be that the bill reported from the conference is the wisest legislation of the two, but we are brought face to face with the question whether we shall legislate in conference or whether we shall legislate on the floor of the Senate and the House. The conferees have palpably exceeded the authority of a conference committee.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no question about that. I concede it.

Mr. CLARK. In my judgment they have vitally changed the character of the bill. For instance, taking the first part of the bill, in section 2 they have entirely eliminated the essential feature of that section by adding a provision which was not considered in either the Senate or the House, and they have rendered entirely valueless to the prospective settler or homesteader on this sort of land any benefit from that section at all. The consequence is, so far as that section is concerned, that it is vitally different from the section of the bill as it was passed by either the House or the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CLARK. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to ask why the addition to section 2 is of vital interest to the bill?

Mr. CLARK. Because section 2 as passed by the House and passed by the Senate is substantially the same as the like provision in the 320-acre-homestead act.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Wyoming that the provision which is added to section 2 by the conference is substantially in compliance with my idea of the meaning of section 2 as it was originally passed.

I recall very well, Mr. President, when we were giving hearings on this bill. Stockmen were before the Senate Committee on Public Lands, and the question was raised by them whether this preferential right given the settler to make application for the land would not permit occupancy by the settler to the exclusion of the stockman before the land had been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as coming within the provisions of the act. It was urged before the committee and by members of the committee that this gave the homesteader or would-be homesteader no additional right at all; that, though he occupied the land before designation, his application filed in the land office gave no right other than the preferential right to file upon the land and make entry when it was finally designated; and that if he occupied it without designation he did it at his peril. I remember myself making that statement.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator see that this cuts off any preferential right?

Mr. STERLING. No; it does not cut off any preferential right. It gives him the right to make application at the land office for the land, and then upon the designation of the land he has a preferential right to file upon it and enter it. It simply provides that he may not occupy the land meanwhile. That is the effect of the addition made by the conferees.

Mr. CLARK. There is a difference of view between the Senator and myself as to the effect of the addition. There is no difference between the Senator and myself as to the question whether that addition should have been made in the Senate instead of by the conference committee.

Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of this report. I am simply going to say that if anybody on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere believes that the bill is going to operate to the benefit of those for whom it was originally framed he is very much mistaken, because such benefits to the homesteader as were put in by the Senate have been taken out by the conference committee; and not only have the conference committee taken out the benefits to the homesteader that were put in by the Senate but they have taken out the benefits that were in the original bill as it came from the House.

Mr. President, I am not going to refrain from antagonizing this report because I think it is going to benefit anybody. It is a piece of absolutely futile legislation; it will become absolutely inoperative. I am not going to call specific attention to the elimination of section 9. Here we have the conference committee eliminating entirely from the bill both the original section 9 passed by the House and the amendment passed by the Senate. The conference committee have done that very thing. In other words, not only have the conferees on the part of the Senate surrendered—as perhaps they would have to surrender in order to reach an agreement—the amendment proposed and passed by the Senate, but both the Senate and the House conferees have omitted and surrendered substantial benefits to the homesteaders that were included in the bill by the affirmative action of both Houses.

I have never seen, Mr. President, a conference report that so frankly exceeded, by the admission of the conferees themselves, the authority of conferees in any bill that ever came from a conference committee into the Senate.

Mr. President, whether this legislation is wise is another matter. I myself believe it is unwise. I believe it is unwise, because I believe it will not accomplish the purpose which the originators of the bill intended. I believe it is unwise because it will not enlarge the opportunity of those who have not now homes upon those lands to get homes, and I believe that the bill might be just as well defeated in the first place in the interest of the large stockmen as to have it passed the way it is presented in the conference report.

Now, having made my statement and given my individual view, I shall be content to let the Senate act as it pleases upon the conference report.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Wyoming takes the view he does in regard to this bill, although I thank him for his statement that he does not expect to make opposition or raise any point of order on the report of the conferees.

Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate is very largely the same bill introduced by myself at the beginning of the last session of Congress. I originally introduced a bill here identical with the bill introduced in the House, and I have worked almost unceasingly for the passage of a grazing homestead bill for the past three years or more.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I know very little about these matters, which more particularly concern Senators from the western section of the country, I do feel impelled to ask the Senator from South Dakota upon what hypothesis the committee of conference eliminated a section of the bill that had been agreed to by both Houses of Congress? If we admit that a conference committee have that authority, or that they can under any circumstances do that thing, of course no bill would be safe in the hands of a conference committee of this body in the future.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. The committee of conference disclaims any authority as a matter of right to do what they have done in this report. Any objection made to the report, will, of course, send the bill back to conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is mistaken about that. Such an objection would have that effect in the House of Representatives, where a point of order can be made against a report, but there would have to be an adverse vote on the report in the Senate to send the bill back to conference.

Mr. THOMAS. We are conscious, if the objection is made, that the fact that we have exceeded our authority will make what we have done of no avail. We have, however, made the report as the only report that we could make upon the bill with any hope of securing its ultimate enactment. Whether the procedure here shall be stopped either by a point of order or a vote is immaterial. An objection can unquestionably dispose of the report.

Mr. CLARK. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. Of course I know the utmost good faith in which the Senator makes his statement and the good faith by which all his acts are governed, but I should like to ask the Senator how strongly the Senate conferees urged upon the House conferees the adoption of the Senate amendments or how many meetings of the conference committee were held?

Mr. THOMAS. I think we had a half dozen meetings. We thrashed the matter out in every possible way. I myself went to the Interior Department in reference to it.

Mr. CLARK. Now, may I ask the Senator in regard to section 2—if it would not betray the confidences of the conference committee—what the impelling force was that caused the conference committee to report an addition to the bill that had never been agreed upon by either House?

Mr. THOMAS. I can only speak for myself, personally. The impelling force to me was the conviction that without that amendment or the elimination of the proviso the bill would not become a law.

Mr. CLARK. That is a very indefinite statement of a definite proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. I make it as definite as it seems to me possible to make it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I want to again call attention to the objections made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I can not appreciate the force of the objections. As I have stated, the addition made by the conferees to section 2—the section which gives the preferential right to make an application for 640 acres of land, coming within the meaning of this act—is what was originally contemplated. It was not the idea of section 2 to give the right to the would-be settler to occupy the land pending the designation by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLARK. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator believe that that was the effect of the provision as passed by both the House and the Senate?

Mr. STERLING. I will not say that that was the effect of the provision, but it was understood that it gave no other right than the right to make application and to have that right to entry suspended until the land had been designated. If a settler occupied the land, he occupied it at his peril; if he put any improvements on the land, he did so at his peril, for meanwhile the land might not be designated by the Secretary of the Interior or it might never be designated.

Mr. CLARK. Then I will ask the Senator if the language meant that, as passed by both the House and the Senate, what is the necessity of the additional provision as made by the conferees?

Mr. STERLING. It certainly makes it clear as to the intention, anyway. If there ever was reasonable action in excess of authority by conferees, it was in adding that little provision to section 2.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to section 9, which has been stricken out by the conferees. I want to read that section. It does not particularly affect the homesteader, the man desiring to enter 640 acres of land as a homestead. It is the purchase section of this bill.

SEC. 9. That any person who has heretofore acquired title to land of the character designated in this act under any of the homestead laws of the United States and who is the owner and occupant of the land so acquired may purchase from the United States not exceeding 320 acres of stock-raising lands, as designated by this act, or unappropriated and unreserved lands valuable only for grazing contiguous to his said homestead, upon paying to the United States the sum of $1.25 per acre for such lands, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which said land, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, shall not exceed 640 acres.

There was a radical objection to that section by the Department of the Interior, Mr. President, as I understand, and the wisdom of putting the section into the law in the first instance might well be questioned. Particularly will it not benefit that class of settlers desiring to acquire homesteads under this act to which the Senator from Wyoming has referred.

The other additions are amendments that are not subject to any question under the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have in the past severely criticized conferees for violating the rules of the Senate by proposing new legislation in a conference report, but I know of no more flagrant case than is shown in the conference report now under consideration. I say this, Mr. President, though I signed the report. I signed the report with the understanding that I should make a statement to the Senate giving my reasons for so doing.

There is no question, Mr. President, that the conferees have exceeded their authority in amending the proviso in section 2 of the bill; in fact, the amendment changes the whole intent of section 2.

Mr. STERLING. How does it change it, may I ask the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator how it changes it, and I shall be very glad to do so. The original proviso in section 2 gives a preferential right to any citizen of the United States to make application for an entry of lands described in the bill. Under the wording of the original proviso he can also occupy the land; he can make whatever improvements he desires upon the land; he can build a home upon it if he so desires. I agree with the Senator from South Dakota that if the settler does so, he does so at his peril, as the land may not be designated by the Secretary of the Interior; but he will be in a position to claim that Congress authorized him by preference to make an application for an entry of the land and that he had expended money on the land in pursuance of that construction of the proviso. Of course, Congress could be hard-hearted and take the position that he had no right to spend his money to make improvements on the land, and under a strict construction of the law he would lose his improvements; but every Senator knows what the result would be; the department knows what the result would be, and they so stated to the Senate conferees time and time again. The result would be that the applicant would come to Congress under such conditions for relief, and the relief measures that would come before Congress would be so numerous that it would keep this body busy for many years to come.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. Is it not better, may I ask the Senator from Utah, that a provision like this be added to section 2 than that the settler or would-be settler should be permitted to go on this land and make improvements at his peril, which he would have to sacrifice afterwards if the land were not designated? Is it not preferable to give him the warning right here, and say that he shall not occupy the land until it is designated?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asks me for my opinion. I will say, certainly it would; but that is not what I was discussing at all. I state now, without the least hesitancy, that the conferees exceeded their authority as representatives of the Senate in adding the amendment to the proviso in section 2.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why was it done?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Michigan asks why it was done. I am going to be a little more frank than was the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. We did it because we were notified that, unless this amendment was added to the proviso, the conference report would not be adopted by the House.

Mr. CLARK. By whom was the notification given? I think we ought to know that.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I will put it in this way, then, in answer to the Senator from Wyoming, that I am quite sure that there would be influence enough brought to bear upon the House Members so that the conference report would not be accepted.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not mean to intimate that there is a lobby in connection with this matter, does he?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not mean an outside lobby. There was a lobby; but I do not have reference to a lobby.

Mr. President, there is no question about the elimination of section 9 being contrary to the rules of the Senate, and the conferees exceeding their authority in so doing. I was opposed to section 9 and was opposed to it before the bill passed the Senate; but that section was adopted by the House and by the Senate. The Senate yielded the amendment which it made to that section. The section then was exactly the same as when it passed the House and as the Senate agreed to it. Then, for the same reason——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there was a slight amendment made to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I so stated.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not understand the Senator to say so.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, for the same reason that we added the proviso in section 2, we struck out section 9.

Mr. CLARK. Because of the same influences?

Mr. SMOOT. Because of the same influences, and I desire to say that the Senator from Colorado in making the statement he did, that the conferees exceeded their authority, was absolutely right. I so state to the Senate now, and it is my opinion that an objection on the part of the Senate will defeat the conference report because of the admitted fact that the conferees have exceeded their authority. It is also true that if the Senate desires to reject this report it can be sent back to conference on a majority vote of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is section 9? I do not recall it myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 9 is the purchase section. It allows an entryman who has already entered land of the character described in the bill and who is now living on the land under the enlarged-homestead law to purchase 320 acres additional of the land as described in this bill. In other words, he does not have to live upon the land; he has no improvements to make upon it; he can purchase it at $1.25 per acre.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, inasmuch as the conferees have admitted that they have changed the bill, and have changed it because some particular influence demanded the change in order to secure its passage, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks the bill is any good now?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think there is a good deal of merit in the bill as reported and it improves the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Utah—I do not ask this in antagonism to the bill, because I confess to not any great knowledge of the subject, and my disposition would be to vote for the conference report—what he thinks would be the effect of a precedent of this kind, that a conference committee can take from a bill matter that both Houses have agreed to? Would it not be notice to other conference committees that they do about as they please in reference to framing conference reports?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be. So we call particular attention to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The very fact that you have called particular attention to it, it seems to me, advertises it and encourages other conference committees to do the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. I frankly state that, in my opinion, one objection would defeat the conference report, but I believe that the measure is of such interest to the people of the West and to citizens of other portions of the United States who desire the passage of such legislation, that their representatives in the Senate will not object to the passage of the bill in the shape in which it now is.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly am not going to make any factious opposition to it, but the Senator says one objection will defeat the conference report. I am sure the Senator does not mean that. A negative vote on the motion to agree to the conference report would have to be carried by a majority to defeat it under our rules.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe it would come in that way. I believe it could be objected to on the ground that the conferees have exceeded their authority, as all the conferees admit that they have. Therefore, Mr. President, under the admission of the conferees, I believe that an objection to the report would be sufficient.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not agree wtih the Senator as to that. Certainly our rule is pretty plain on that point.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The statement the Senator has just made in regard to the influences upon the conferees emphasizes the fact that we are probably about to legislate, not of our own free will and not as an independent department of this Government, but to legislate at the beck and call and the absolute will of some powers outside of the Chambers of either House of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will be perfectly frank, and say that I opposed the proviso in section 2 as it was written. If this bill had become a law with the proviso in section 2 retained in it as it passed the House and Senate, I am quite sure that there would have been a great deal of unnecessary trouble to the men who made application for land under it. There would be no doubt a great deal of money spent in improving the land applied for and perhaps a great deal of money spent in the building of homes, and I am as positive as I can be that if the bill should pass without the proviso there would be hundreds of citizens of the United States applying to Congress for relief.

Mr. STERLING. Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah agrees as to the merits of the proviso or the addition added to section 2?

Mr. SMOOT. I do; but I want to say to the Senator that I would very much prefer to have the whole proviso eliminated from the bill. Then every citizen of the United States would have been on an equal footing; then the Interior Department would have designated the land under the provisions of the bill; every citizen would have known that the land was designated; and there would have been no question about his right, if he were otherwise qualified, to enter the land.

I will say to the Senate that there could have been required in the regulations of the department 30 days' notice to the public that the land had been designated, and then any citizen anywhere in the United States receiving that notice would have had the privilege of entering any of the lands, and the first one that made the entry would secure the lands, because there would have been then no question as to his right of entry if he were qualified to make entry under the provisions of the bill, and no one could have entered the lands unless it was to contest the entry made by the original entryman.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Listeners are a little confused over this situation; at least, I am. Do I understand, notwithstanding the fact that the conferees have violated the rules of the Senate from a technical standpoint, that nevertheless the report meets with their judgment as to its being a good bill?

Mr. SMOOT. The conferees believe it a good bill, and the conferees recommend the adoption of this report.

Mr. BORAH. Then the only thing about which there seems to be any controversy, so far as the conferees are concerned, is the mere question of whether you have exceeded your authority, and whether that shall defeat a good bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Well, there is no question about our having exceeded our authority. The only question is, Having exceeded our authority, shall the Senate adopt the conference report? I will say to the Senator that I think the bill has the approval of a great majority of the people in the public-land States.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, with reference to the conferees exceeding their authority, let me say there is precedent for that.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. STERLING. There is precedent for it again and again, where admittedly the conferees have exceeded their authority, but notwithstanding the report of the conferees was adopted.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the only difficulty about this situation is that we have presented to us here by the conference committee an absolutely new bill upon this whole general subject matter to which we are not allowed to make amendments in any way whatever; and the consequence is that we are in the position of legislating upon a bill that is presented without reference to a committee and without the power of amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the only argument in favor of it is that the end justifies the means, which I think is a very bad argument.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only argument that can be made, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. As I recollect, the Senator was in favor of practically the same provision in the so-called enlarged-homestead bill—that is, a provision recognizing the same spirit, that those who had acquired lands under the homestead law, taking 160 acres, should be given the right to take an additional homestead. I know the Senator from Utah was in favor of that. Now, is not this recognizing the same spirit in this particular bill?

Mr. SMOOT. There is quite a difference, Mr. President, as I stated so often in conference when the House conferees insisted that that was the case. In the enlarged-homestead bill, known as the 320-acre-homestead bill, this same preferential right, without the amendment that has been put upon it by the conferees, was in the bill. It is the law to-day; but in the enlarged-homestead bill there were requirements made that the entryman must cultivate so many acres of the land. I think it was one-eighth during the first two years, or by the end of two years; it was one-quarter by the end of the third year, and it was one-half during the fourth and the fifth years, and at the end of the fifth year he could make his final proof for patent.

Mr. GRONNA. I will ask the Senator whether that requirement is not in this bill also?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. GRONNA. The entryman must improve the land, but he can do that by inclosing the land with fences or make other improvements.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President. This land is entirely different land. The applicant had the right to go upon the land. He knew that unless he entered the land as described in the bill, and unless he could comply with the requirements of the bill he could secure no title to it. The land must be of such a character that he could raise other than native grasses on a certain number of acres, as described in the bill. Now, this character of land is simply grazing land. It is land where all he has to do is to expend $1.25 per acre upon it, as the Senate passed the bill; but the House insists that he shall live upon it.

Mr. GRONNA. But as to the character of the land, was not that left to the Secretary of the Interior in that case just the same as here?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; it was to be finally designated by the Secretary of the Interior. I will say to the Senator that the same principle in this bill as to preferential rights is also in the 320-acre enlarged-homestead bill; but the reason why it is not necessary in this bill, as it was in the enlarged-homestead bill, is that the character of the land is entirely different, and the requirement made by the Government in regard to the cultivation of it is entirely different. This requires no cultivation, and in the case of the enlarged-homestead bill it requires a certain cultivation.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon another interruption, I believe it is true, as the Senator has said, that the committee has improved the bill, because you provide here specifically that no land can be purchased. That is in the interest of the small man, the small holder, the man who goes upon these lands to make a home; and that is the man we ought to legislate for. Now, I agree with the Senator from Utah in that. There is no opportunity under the provisions of this bill for any great corporation to hire people to secure these lands. That has been eliminated by the amendment proposed by the conference committee. I believe that we who are from the public-land States, and recognize the merit of this bill, should allow it to go through and become a law.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just on the point he is speaking on?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not happen to have the floor. I was speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK. I just wanted to ask a question. Of course, the only purchase in this bill is the purchase of additional land by the homesteader, and not by anybody else?

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that that is so.

Mr. CLARK. Not by any great corporation.

Mr. GRONNA. But I will say to the Senator from Utah that hardly a bill has passed the Senate since I became a Member of it where in some respect the conference committee have not exceeded their authority. I know that that was true with regard to the immigration bill, and that is true with regard to nearly every other bill. Now, why be so technical upon a bill like this, which is only going to benefit a few poor people?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I was not technical, and I am not objecting to this conference report. I am simply pointing out the fact that this conference committee have done something that I think no conference committee ever did before; and that is, according to their own statement, they have yielded to outside pressure to strike out from the bill sections that both Houses have agreed upon, and to write into the bill sections that neither House has passed upon.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that no one has criticized legislating in conference more than I, but I do not quite agree with the Senator from North Dakota when he says that it is done in every conference report. I know that there have been great changes made, but I do not remember any conference report since I have been in the Senate where a whole section of a bill has been stricken from it and no substitute offered in its place. That being the case, we thought it was perfectly proper, and, in fact, we felt that it was our duty to call it to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will again pardon me, I want to say to the Senator that I was a member of the committee of conference on the agricultural bill, where we had three legislative acts included; and I want to say to the Senator that whole sections were stricken out in conference, and there was no objection made to it.

Mr. SMOOT. But there were other provisions substituted. There is no provision substituted for section 9. It authorizes the entryman of certain lands to purchase 320 acres of land at $1.25 an acre, and that provision has been stricken from the bill and nothing put in its place or substituted for it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the one was just as clearly legislation upon the part of the conferees as the other.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that it was legislation, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. It was legislation. There was no difference in principle between the two.

Mr. SMOOT. Only as to degree.

Now, there is just one other matter that I wish to refer to, as I want to have a vote taken upon the conference report before 2 o'clock, if possible.

The Senate will notice that in the case of all their amendments—and most of the amendments of the Senate were upon this one subject—the Senate thought it was proper to strike out these words:

Of lands of the character herein described.

The Senate struck out those words all through the bill. That, of course, gave an entryman who had made an original homestead entry the right to enter lands under the bill. The House would not yield on that, and therefore the Senate had to yield on all of its amendments of that character.

Taking it as a whole, Mr. President, I feel that the bill should have been improved so as to bring a greater relief to the public-land States than the reported measure.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, this bill was very thoroughly considered in the Public Lands Committee, of which I am a member. It met with a good deal of opposition in that committee. I have never believed in it myself. I deferred to the wishes of Senators representing other States who claimed that it would be beneficial in those States, and made no opposition to it in the committee, and I did not oppose it in the Senate when it was up for passage.

My own belief about it is that 640 acres of land of the kind that is described in this bill would be a good place for people to starve on. I do not believe, generally speaking, that this so-called grazing land would be such that a man could make a living upon it; and it is principally for that reason—that it might be an inducement for people to enter upon those lands who would fail to make a living and come to distress—that I was opposed to the bill. But, as I say, I have not urged my objections to it heretofore because of the feeling of Senators who represent other States. I do not think that it would be of any value at all in my State.

As to the other question, of the conference committee exceeding its authority, that seems to be an admitted fact. It is attempted to be justified here because some other committees have done the same thing. That does not appeal to me as a good reason for violating a rule of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Why, Mr. President, as I understand, our attitude toward this bill is a good deal like the situation when somebody wants somebody else to hit a fellow. A number of Senators object to the precedent, but still they support it. I do not think the bill is a wise one. I do not believe it is in the interest of the settler. I believe it will prove a failure to the bona fide home builder. It is said that an objection would defeat it. If that were true, I would object. But it takes a majority to reject this report; that we have not got. I shall vote against its adoption because while intended to help the homesteaders I do not believe it will have that effect.

Mr. WORKS. Very true. I am expressing my conviction now, however; not that of somebody else, I think that a matter so important as this, which involves legislation by a conference committee, should not be allowed to pass without at least objection being entered to it; and I am glad that objection was made. I think it is one of the evils of legislation in this body that conference committees assume to legislate for both Houses of Congress, and I think it ought not to be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. STONE and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I desire to move an executive session.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the point of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. A point of order, Mr. President. The Senator from Missouri had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Sterling
Borah	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Stone
Brady	Gronna	Nelson	Sutherland
Brandegee	Harding	Overman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Hollis	Penrose	Thomas
Chilton	Hughes	Phelan	Townsend
Clapp	James	Pittman	Wadsworth
Clark	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Walsh
Culberson	Jones	Saulsbury	Watson
Cummins	Kenyon	Sheppard	Weeks
Curtis	Kern	Sherman	Williams
Dillingham	Lane	Smith, Ariz.	Works
du Pont	Lee, Md.	Smith, Ga.
Fletcher	McCumber	Smoot

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I know the motion is not debatable, but I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri a question before the motion is put. I understand that the purpose of the executive session is to consider a nomination to the Interstate Commerce Commission. There will be very earnest opposition to the consideration of the nomination at this time, and if it is taken up for consideration it will require several days, I believe, to conclude it. In view of these circumstances I ask whether the Senator from Missouri desires to insist upon his motion?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the nomination referred to by the Senator from Iowa is pending on the Calendar of Executive Business. It is very important in the interest of public business that it should be acted upon. Unless acted upon there will be a vacancy in this important position before the Senate meets again. There are important public reasons why that vacancy should not occur, and it is because of that I have made the motion now pending before the Senate, upon which I ask for a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not desire to argue the matter——

Mr. STONE. It is not proper to argue it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no right to argue it; but upon the motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. He being absent, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when the name of Mr. SAULSBURY was called). The occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. He transfers that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and votes "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I note my general pair, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], is absent. I will transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I have already voted, but I withdraw my vote owing to the pair I have with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. He being absent, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, December 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 21, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bend low, O God our Heavenly Father, that we may feel the warmth of Thy brooding love and be encouraged to move forward to larger and nobler attainments as intellectual, moral, and spiritual beings; and meet the disappointments, sorrows, and untoward circumstances of life with perfect faith and confidence in the overruling of Thy providence for the eternal good of Thy children; in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the recent note sent by the President of the United States to the belligerent nations with the view of terminating the war that has distracted the world.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to print the recent note of the President of the United States to the belligerent nations of the world with the view of terminating the war. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUOR.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask for a change of reference. The bill H. R. 17850, introduced by myself on December 4, either by the general practice in the House or by inadvertence, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I respectfully submit that it deals with interstate commerce only and it should have been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. What was it about?

Mr. HOWARD. It is an inhibition against shipment in interstate commerce of whisky into States wherein by the law of those States the sale of whisky is prohibited.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17850) to prohibit commerce in intoxicating liquors between the States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, while undoubtedly the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce under the rules ought to have jurisdiction of these bills, as a practice for years they have been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not think it advisable to have a divided jurisdiction.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood that the practice had been such, but it seems it is an assumption of jurisdiction by the Committee on the Judiciary. If this question dealt with the shipment of live stock or wheat, or grain, or meat, or any other commodity, it would be sent to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. And I can see no reason why the rules should be varied where it is a pure question of interstate commerce, no matter what the practice has been, simply because it deals with liquor. The jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary is certainly questioned when a bill deals purely with a matter of interstate commerce.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, when I was early a member to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce there were some bills introduced on the subject which were referred to that committee and others which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe there was one other committee that had such bills pending before it. But the final consensus of opinion was that they should all be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not say whether they ought to go to that committee or not, but I am very confident there ought not to be two or three committees of the House dealing with the same subject matter.

Mr. HOWARD. I agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. MANN. So I shall have to object.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for just a second?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly; I reserve it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have made an investigation. The gentleman in his long service on the committee I know has given much time to these matters and knows more about the reference of such bills than I do, but I think the gentleman will find this to be true, that wherever a bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary dealing with the interstate shipment of whisky it has been a mixed question, that there were certain penalties and certain legal questions involved, and for a long time, I understand, by practice it was assumed that there was a question, rather, as to the power of Congress, a constitutional question, involved in these interstate shipments of liquor, and for that reason, being a mixed question of commerce and law, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANN. I think the real reason, perhaps, was that a whole lot of these bills were sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, such as the antitrust legislation, because at that time the Judiciary Committee was not quite as busy as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and was a very able committee, and the House willing to trust it. I am not willing to start in by unanimous consent to mix up the jurisdiction of the various committees.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether or not when per se a bill has been referred to a committee that has no jurisdiction under the rules of the House, the Speaker will recognize the introducer for the purpose of moving that the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the bill has been referred, be deposed of its authority to consider this bill, and that it be referred to the proper committee?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman would read the rule he would not make the parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that the chairmen of these two committees or somebody that has the direction of the bill can make that motion. The truth about that is that it is easier to have uniformity of reference than it is to originally pick the right committee, and what investigation the Chair has made shows that this kind of bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for some time. The Chair is not arguing against the gentleman's change of reference. He is simply telling the gentleman how the bill came to be referred.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood that precedents ought at times to be changed.

The SPEAKER. That is true. I wish I could change 50 of them without disrupting the business of the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the statement that all these bills for the last 10 or 12 years have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I introduced 10 years ago the identical bill which has just been introduced by the gentleman from Georgia, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. That is the reason why it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary now. That committee has a sort of dragnet jurisdiction, anyhow.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of inland waterways, and to include some observations by Admiral Benson, Chief of Naval Operations, United States Navy, and Brig. Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of inland waterways. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. On what subject?

The SPEAKER. Inland waterways. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HELEN SHERMAN.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

House resolution 390 (H. Rept. 1237).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Helen Sherman, clerk to Luis Munoz Rivera, late Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico at the time of his death, November 15, 1916, the sum of $125, being an amount equal to one month's salary of a clerk of a Resident Commissioner.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual allowance made to the private secretary of a deceased Member, giving one month's salary after the death of a Member.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LENORA M'CALL COURTS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers the following privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 391 (H. Rept. 1238).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Lenora McCall Courts, widow of James C. Courts, late clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this is a little different resolution from what we have been offering on the death of an employee of the House. Mr. Courts, as you know, was the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations. He had been connected with the Committee on Appropriations for 39 consecutive years, during all administrations, since he was first employed. Since 1884 he was the clerk of that committee until the time of his death last September.

He devoted his whole time and attention during all those years to the service of that committee and the Government, and it is safe to say that no man connected with this House, either within the Chamber or out of it, was more faithful and valuable and meant more to the Government, so far as his work was concerned, than Mr. Courts, and we think that under the circumstances it is nothing but right that we should allow a year's salary to his widow, just as we would in the case of the widow of a Member of Congress, if a Member of Congress died. Heretofore in the case of other employees we have allowed a sum equal to six months' salary.

I am inclined to believe that the resolution is a highly proper one under the circumstances, and I want it distinctly understood, so far as the Committee on Accounts is concerned, that we are not offering this as a precedent for the future. And yet if it is construed as a precedent in the future, there is no danger, because this individual served 39 years, and if anybody else served 39 years it would not be a serious burden to the Government if a year's salary were allowed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not also a fact that he was thoroughly efficient?

Mr. LLOYD. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me three minutes?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to know Mr. Courts during his lifetime as the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, and to serve with him as a member of the committee. I can think of no man who has ever served the Government of the United States who served it with as great devotion and as unselfishly and with greater ability than Mr. James C. Courts.

It must be regretted by everybody that a man of his type has to be called away. There never was a man in the Government service, I believe, no matter what position he may have held, who was so thoroughly devoted to the service as Mr. Courts was. I think there never was a man in the service of the Government who so thoroughly understood the service as he did. There never was a time when a member of the Committee on Appropriations called upon him for information that he did not have it at his fingers' ends. He was courteous, accommodating, assiduous in the discharge of his duties, always ready to meet every demand. He was an ideal public servant.

I regret as much as any man can that he has been called away from the activities in which he was so long engaged. To be a servant to the public such as Mr. Courts was is the greatest honor that I believe can be conferred upon a man. It does not necessarily follow that a man must be conspicuous in the public eye in order to be a great citizen; and if there ever was a great citizen, performing a great service to a great people, James C. Courts was that man. And we can do no greater honor to ourselves than to pass without a dissenting vote the resolution presented by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts. It seems to me that even then we shall not have done the honor to the memory of James C. Courts that he is entitled to.

I shall always remember my acquaintance with him as one of the pleasantest things that I have ever known in public life, for he surely was a man who merited the confidence of every person with whom he came in contact, and earned the right to the confidence of the American people. His memory is justly entitled to a place upon the records of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Courts was from the town of Huntingdon, Carroll County, Tenn., a town and county in my district, and I want to say from intimate personal knowledge of Mr. Courts that everything that has been said in his praise here is true and those that knew the details might talk for hours and then not tell all the elements of the beneficial public service rendered by this man for nearly half a century.

But I do feel that I ought to add that I am personally well acquainted with his family, and I know that Mrs. Courts and his family are worthy of anything that this Government may do for them. If Mr. Courts had given his life to the service of some profitable industry or to some money-earning corporation, no doubt his family would not now need this appropriation. But as it is they do need it. I want to ask, as the gentleman from Illinois who has taken his seat [Mr. MADDEN] did, that every Member of this House vote for this resolution in view of the facts and circumstances. If I asked for less, I feel that I would be recreant in the manifest discharge of my duty. But should another case of this sort arise, if any future clerk of that great committee who has rendered such conspicuous and valuable service to his country dies after so long and so efficient service, I hope that the Congress will at that time deal generously with his family and with his name and fame.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I have a couple of minutes?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] two minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my tribute of esteem and affection for the late clerk of the great Committee on Appropriations. I first met Mr. Courts 35 years ago when I was the Assistant Doorkepeer of this House and he was the assistant clerk to the committee, and we kept up our acquaintance and friendship until the time of his departure. I was very much attached to him and valued his friendship. I not only counted him my personal friend, but the members of our families long ago learned to love each other. It is well for this great legislative body to pause for a while in its deliberations and work to pay a just and fitting tribute to one who rendered such signal and valuable service to his country. He was a son of Tennessee, and his ancestors were among the pioneers of the Volunteer State. It will be a long, long time before his position will be filled with that signal ability, faithfulness, and patience which he demonstrated throughout his long years of service to his country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE CHAPLAIN.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House resolution 413 (H. Rept. 1239).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the Rev. Henry N. Couden, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, the sum of $300, as additional compensation for the fiscal year 1917.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the Chaplain of the House at the present time receives $1,200 a year. A number of Representatives on the floor have insisted that the present Chaplain is entitled to better recognition, and a resolution was presented and referred to the Committee on Accounts asking that for this fiscal year the amount be increased $300, making it $1,500; and after investigating the matter the committee came to the conclusion that it was proper recognition.

Mr. COX. How much does the Chaplain of the Senate get?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know.

Mr. COX. I think he gets only $1,200 a year.

Mr. MANN. He gets $1,200.

Mr. COX. I think that is what he gets. The present Chaplain of the House gets a pension, does he not?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. He does.

Mr. COX. I understand he gets a pension of $72 a month.

Mr. LLOYD. If he gets a pension of $72 a month, he gets it because he deserves it. Any man who has lost his eyes as a result of Army service is poorly paid when he is paid $72 a month for his eyes. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. That is true. I thoroughly agree with that statement. I have profound respect for our Chaplain, but I do not see any necessity of paying more than the Senate pay theirs. No reason has been advanced for it yet that satisfies me. However, I am sure this resolution is going to pass.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me a couple of minutes?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, who introduced the resolution.

Mr. MANN. The Chaplain of the Senate and the Chaplain of the House now receive the same salary. The Chaplain of the Senate is one of the ministers of the town, having charge of a church here, and I should say that $100 a month was pretty fair compensation, under those circumstances, for the service he performs for the Senate, and doubtless we could obtain the same service for that money without any difficulty.

The present Chaplain of the House has been Chaplain since before I came here, and I have been here several years. He was continued under the Democratic administration, although he was a Republican, and I suppose he still is. I pay tribute to that side of the House for having continued him. In recent years we have imposed some additional duty upon him by publishing his prayers. But the real reason for the introduction of this resolution grows out of these circumstances: The Chaplain is blind. His wife has been in the habit of conducting him to the Capitol, and she has been the person to look after him in every way whatever. Recently she was afflicted with a paralytic stroke and is now unable to perform the services which were performed by her before, and instead of being an aid to him in conducting him around, she herself now requires some attention. The House the other day, by unanimous consent—that is, on an amendment that I offered, which was subject to a point of order—increased the salary of the Chaplain of the House for the next fiscal year by the sum of $600 so long as the office was held by the present incumbent. I introduced a resolution to pay $300, or half that amount, for the next six months, understanding that it met the approval of the full House, by the action taken on the legislative bill for the next fiscal year.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, in the matter of the blind who have been here we have been kind, I think. The Member of the House who is blind is furnished a page at Government expense. The Senator of the United States who is blind is furnished a page at Government expense, and under the unfortunate circumstances which have come to the Chaplain, it looks to me as though this additional compensation may very properly be given.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PORTRAIT OF EX-SPEAKER CANNON.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will present a resolution from the committee.

Mr. HICKS. I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House resolution 416 (H. Rept. 1240).

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library is authorized and directed to procure a portrait of former Speaker JOSEPH G. CANNON at a cost not exceeding $2,000, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LOBECK, for two days, on account of illness.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19119) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 54, line 8, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 54 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Reserving the right to object, let us hear what the amendment is.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It is merely to offer a letter to properly spell a word. The word "estimate" should be "estimated."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 8, strike out the word "estimate" and insert the word "estimated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 11 copies of volumes 48 and 49 of the reports of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, authorized to be furnished under section 229 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia as amended July 1, 1902, at $5 each, $110.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The debate on the bill yesterday was enlivened by a discussion participated in by Members on both sides of the House relative to the causes and effect of the last election. In view of the interest that the House took in that discussion, I would like to have read in my time a speech on that subject recently made by a former Member of the House, the Hon. Frederick Landis, of Indiana, one of the wittiest men, I think, that has ever sat in this House, certainly in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have read in his time a speech by Mr. Landis. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the speech, as follows:

INDIANA'S NEW HUMORIST TELLS ABOUT ELECTION.

[From speech of Hon. Fred. Landis at Indiana Society Banquet.]

Indiana has just finished a great campaign, and the result was due to a diminished homicidal tendency among Republicans and to the absence of so many Democrats at Leavenworth.

It was a "campaign of education," and the Federal grand jury is now preparing to issue the diplomas.

In Washington the social season begins with Congress, but with us it begins with this grand jury, and this august body opens automatically as the polls close.

The people at home were resigned throughout the late contest. If the Democrats won, MARSHALL would be Vice President, and if the Republicans won it would be Fairbanks.

We were bound to lose, no matter how it went!

We are in the midst of great activity; newly elected candidates are writing reminiscences of their childhood and cigarette testimonials; defeated candidates are withdrawing from secret societies and entering the insurance business; gravel-road contractors, prompted by Anglo-Saxon unrest—and the dictograph—are moving to the far West; party workers are closing cellar windows with the lithographs of their heroes; those who lost election bets are dodging up and down alleys; post-office applicants are sending petitions to Congressmen and receiving garden seeds in reply, while multitudes from the land of my ancestors are changing the names of their children from Theodore to Adolph!

The whole contest was unsatisfactory; whenever a man thought of Hughes he was for Wilson, and whenever he thought of Wilson he was for Hughes, and so the votes of States were cast for the gentleman whom the voters did not have in mind when they went to the polls.

We of the "G. O. P." were at a great disadvantage.

It was charged that our nominees did not belong to the human race, and we were never quite able to supply them with satisfactory credentials, even with the assistance of John T. McCutcheon, by all odds the most effective Republican campaigner in the United States.

We were handicapped by another thing in the late fight; the masses could not be convinced that our leaders really were candidates for office. Whole towns would come down to the railroad yards, where we had them on exhibition, look them over, and then conclude that they must be on their way to a Dunkard conference somewhere.

It was a great mistake to let anybody see them!

As in the case of that other great Republican, James J. Jeffries, Mr. Hughes was overtrained—and in both cases it occurred in California.

Looking backward, we now realize that the country would have been saved if we had just played croquet.

Many were surprised when Mr. Wilson received the votes of so many women, but that was only to be expected. The women of the country are very grateful to the President, whoever he may happen to be; they realize that if men did not have him to abuse millions of them would beat their wives!

There is one thing, however, for which we may all rejoice—the people are thinking more than ever.

God only knows what they're thinking about—but they are!

Indiana is "progressive"—except on election day.

She will not let any State go around her.

And so she is for "preparedness."

She demands that amount of it which is necessary to prevent her being pillaged by anybody except those whom she has elected for that purpose.

She is not provincial and she has no prejudice against foreign destroyers; she simply does not need them.

She has a band of statesmen who are guaranteed to make any place resemble a Belgian cathedral within 48 hours!

But while euthusiastically for "preparedness," we can not exactly agree as to its habits and customs.

The followers of Bryan insist that it means boundless love; they declare that we will never be absolutely safe till we have at least 20,000,000 trained Romeos.

Then if the Japs should come, we would meet them at the Golden Gate and utterly overwhelm them with a game of "post office"!

The adherents of the President are heroic; they stand where Thomas stood at Chickamauga.

They will consent to nothing less than universal penmanship!

The "Old Guard" of my altogether harmonious party would do nothing till danger stood at the door; it would just go on watering the stock till the invader appeared and then it would convene the national committee of 1912 and command it to throw the invader out!

Since the passage of the corrupt-practices act our prosperity has rested upon the farm. It is the only thing which does rest upon the farm, except the president of your society—Mr. George Ade.

This gentleman has done a great thing for Indiana; he has developed her sense of humor till it is impossible to find anybody willing to serve on a governor's staff.

It is doubtful if the country could have survived the last four years without George Ade.

When President Wilson cold-creamed the dictionary and powdered it and florida-watered it and penciled its eyelashes and taught it to "walk Spanish" and enter the parlor properly and bow and retire without turning its back on any of the "company" or bringing its bustle in contact with the whatnot—it was at this critical period in our national life that the head of your society became indispensable to our very existence!

What a refuge he has been after a debauch of "perfect English"!

When our medulla-oblongatas and "Colorado Maduros" have been jammed full of metaphorical ladyfingers—what heavenly surcease it has been to have George Ade drag Noah Webster from his pedestal and saw off both of his legs!

[Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, municipal court, $25,050.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAINEY). The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Court of Appeals Building, District of Columbia: Two watchmen, at $720 each; elevator operator, $720; three laborers, at $480 each; mechanician (under the direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds), $1,200: Provided, That the clerk of the court of appeals shall be the custodian of said building, under the direction and supervision of the justices of said court; in all $4,800.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill in line 23, page 76, in the last word. In that line there are two letters missing. It should be "appeals."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, line 23, strike out "appea" and insert "appeals."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

REFORMATORIES AND CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

Washington Asylum and Jail: Superintendent, $1,800; visiting physician, $1,200; resident physician, $480; two assistant resident physicians, at $120 each; clerk, $840; engineer, $900; three assistant engineers at $600 each; night watchman, $480; blacksmith and woodworker, $500; driver for dead wagon, $365; hostler and driver, for supply and laundry wagon, at $240 each; hospital cook, $600; assistant cooks—two at $300 each, one $180; trained nurse, who shall act as superintendent of nursing, $1,200; two graduate nurses at $480 each; graduate nurse for receiving ward, $480; two nurses for annex wards at $540 each; nurse for operating room, $540; eight orderlies, and two orderlies for annex wards, at $300 each; pupil nurses, not less than 21 in number (nurses to be paid not to exceed $120 per annum during first year of service, and not to exceed $150 per annum during second year of service), $3,000; registered pharmacist, who shall act as hospital clerk, $720; gardener, $540; seamstress, $300; housekeeper, $420; laundryman, $600; assistant laundryman, $365; three laundresses at $360 each; two chambermaids, three waiters, and seven ward maids, at $180 each; temporary labor, not to exceed $1,200; operator of X-ray machine, $600; pathologist, $600; anæsthetist, $300; in all, $29,610.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to amend line 15 by striking out the figures "600" and inserting "720."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 78, line 15, by striking out the figures "600" and inserting "720."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, this is the recommendation of the commissioners. There are three assistant engineers who have charge of the engines, and I note on the page just before that you are paying the fireman the sum of $720. It occurs to me that this is the same pay for the same character of work.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The fireman that the gentleman refers to in the preceding paragraph is at the courthouse, and has to furnish his own board and keep. The fireman at this institution is furnished subsistence, and that accounts for the difference in the pay.

Mr. KING. What does the gentleman mean by "subsistence"?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. He is fed—he receives his board; and as to the lodging I am not sure.

Mr. KING. I do not understand it that way.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Then the gentleman has a wrong understanding. Every one of these employees in this institution receives their subsistence—their board.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, these engineers have families who are dependent upon the salary of $50 a month that they receive.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have no information about the families, but I know that every employee in the institution is furnished with board. That accounts for the rather lower range of salaries in this institution than in others.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina a question. Every once in a while we read in the newspapers some criticism of the lack of emergency-hospital service in Washington. I have rather a complete ignorance on the subject. Is the gentleman prepared to say whether, in his judgment, there is an adequate emergency hospital in this city?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York professes complete ignorance of this question, it would take me very much longer than the limit I can likely secure under the five-minute rule to enlighten him. It is a long story. Answering his question directly, my judgment is that the facilities for the care of the indigent sick in the city of Washington are less good than in any municipality of which I have any knowledge.

I have said on former occasions on the floor of the House, addressing myself to this subject, that it was the one crying disgrace in the Capital of the Nation that no better facilities were provided for the care of this class of people within this jurisdiction. I have been trying since I have had charge of this bill to bring about a condition by which the District government could construct a municipal hospital that would be in keeping with the needs of the Capital itself. There are so many angles of opposition to the construction of such a hospital that it is absolutely futile to undertake it in this House. It has been provided on this bill several times and it always goes out. In writing the bill this time the subcommittee have been at last convinced that there was no hope of commencing the work on a municipal hospital in the District to relieve the District needs, and we have provided somewhat more liberally for the patching up of the present quarters used for that purpose.

I wish that at some time I might have the time again before I retire to private life upon the 4th of March next to express my indignation not altogether at the action of this body but largely at the action of the citizenship of the District of Columbia. They are aiding in this opposition to a hospital because nobody wants it located within 5 miles of where he lives. I have neither the time, I will say to the gentleman from New York, nor would the House indulge me if I were to undertake to go fully into this matter. It is a question upon which I feel rather strongly, and could express myself equally so.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely astounded at the situation disclosed by the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina. As I said when I rose, I had a complete ignorance upon the subject, but it seems to me almost incredible that in these enlightened days—I might almost say these softer days—necessary hospital facilities should be impossible to obtain in a city the size of the city of Washington. I represent in part a large city, and over on the Manhattan end, in New York County, although the population is much more dense than it is in any part of the city of Washington, we have three hospitals that I can think of at the moment. They had two, and just this last week another one was authorized. That is in addition to the homes for the aged and matters of that sort.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Possibly I do not thoroughly understand the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE]. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rather starts me on a new line of thought. In addition to our public hospitals in the city of New York, we have many—I do not know how many; probably 70 or 80 or 100—that might be called semipublic, like St. Vincent de Paul, or the Presbyterian Hospital, or the Polytechnic, and homes, like the Home for Incurables and the Home for the Aged, and so forth. Did the gentleman's criticism include hospitals of that character, or did he understand me as referring only to entirely public hospitals?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I directed no criticism at all to the private hospitals or their facilities or the treatment of the patients assigned to them, but they exercise a rather strict surveillance over the character of patients that are assigned to them by the Board of Charities, and the diseases with which they are suffering. I am not exactly sure of the sum, but I am quite sure that the Government of the United States has invested in the construction of private hospitals on land owned by private corporations within the last few years—10 or 15—more than $2,000,000 in this city, hospitals to which it has absolutely no title—enough to have constructed three municipal hospitals for the care of all these sick. Under a contract made by the Board of Charities as provided for in this bill with these private hospitals, they care for patients at a certain contract price, but there is an excess of patients over and above those contracted for by the Board of Charities, and there are now lodged in these wooden buildings, and in many instances under insanitary conditions, more than 300 indigent sick people. There are indigent sick people suffering from rheumatism lodged in the basement of a building below ground. There are men on cots in corridors, the crowded condition is such. The Government years ago secured a plat of land of 14 or more acres at Fourteenth and Upshur Streets, in the northwestern part of the city, on which has been constructed one unit of a municipal hospital, a tuberculosis hospital, and the proposition was made to construct a municipal hospital on the land owned by the District in that locality, an elevated portion of the District, and the whole northwestern part of the city rose up in arms against its location there. They have approached Members of Congress individually and have had them pledge themselves in some instances against voting for an appropriation for this hospital unless it was specified it should not be located on that particular spot. Other people in other sections of the city where there was probability that it might be located have come with petitions and protests. There is no place within the District of Columbia where the citizens in that part will allow a hospital of this character to be constructed without protest.

Mr. BENNET. Does not the gentleman think it is about time that the people of the city of Washington learned that they live in a city and that the sick of the city must be cared for in the city?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think, and I shall put it just as strongly and a little more so than did the gentleman awhile ago, that this condition and the objection of the citizens to the establishment of this institution for the care of the indigent sick is inhumane.

Mr. BENNET. Why does not the gentleman, before he gets away from the proper part of this bill, give some one at least the opportunity of making the point of order against the provision for a hospital? Why not try out the proposition?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Why, Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I brought it into this very Congress, in the last session of this Congress, in the bill when it came from the Senate. Why should I merely make an experiment? I have made protests here in the interest of this institution, very much stronger than merely offering it to the House for its acceptance, to see it go out on a point of order; and I do not see that we gain anything or get anywhere. I can go further, and will say to the gentleman that if the subcommittee having charge of this bill had not known that we could not get it to pass this House we would have inserted it in this bill, without giving away any secret; but it is something that has been tried out. I do not know how other men may be, but I sometimes recognize the fact when I am utterly licked, as I am in this case.

Mr. BENNET. Of course the gentleman knows this House, and no one would ask him to do a futile thing. Certainly his feelings on the subject are strong enough, and, therefore, the House must assume that he has exhausted every expedient which he thinks would be helpful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired, and, without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payments to destitute women and children: For payment to beneficiaries named in section 3 of "An act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or willfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances," approved March 23, 1906, $6,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia, on itemized vouchers duly audited and approved by the auditor of said District.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill whether there is in the District of Columbia anything in the nature of a widowed-mothers' act?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No; not that I am familiar with, and I think not. I think I can say positively there is not.

Mr. BENNET. So if a woman, for example, is widowed and unable to support her children they must, if they are cared for by the municipality, be taken away from her and sent to an institution?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They must be taken care of by the Board of Charities at some private institution. There is no provision or law by which she could, because of her condition as a widowed mother, receive directly from any fund for her support.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman know whether there has been an attempt made to pass one of these modern statutes in reference to widowed mothers?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Not being on the legislative committee for the District of Columbia, I can not answer that question. Not through the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BENNET. This seems to be the only opportunity we have to talk about legislation for the District, and therefore the gentleman must excuse me if I ask these questions.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman is excused. I can not answer the gentleman; I do not know.

Mr. BENNET. I thank the gentleman very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Support of prisoners: For maintenance of jail prisoners of the District of Columbia at the Washington Asylum and Jail, including pay of guards and all other necessary personal services, and for support of prisoners therein, $50,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion for the purpose of making an inquiry of the committee as to the reason for not setting out the officers paid under this appropriation. Does this appropriation include the officers and their salaries?

Mr. HOWARD. It includes the superintendent, the deputy superintendent, the superintendent of buildings, a clerk, captains of the watch, guards, engineers, matrons, steward, stenographer.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire why these officers and their salaries are not set out in the bill the same as other provisions have been?

Mr. HOWARD. This is the reason: They vary in the number. They had to be carried under the provision making appropriation for the maintenance of the jail. Now, for instance, they have 13 guards estimated for in this bill, 2 engineers, matron, steward, stenographer, 1 superintendent, 1 deputy superintendent, 1 superintendent of buildings, a clerk, 3 captains of the watch. That is the estimate for this year.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman understand that the salaries of these officers provided and not set out in this paragraph are increased in the general appropriation of a per cent of increase the same as the other officers named?

Mr. HOWARD. I think the contemplation is if the salaries are less than $1,200 they get a 10 per cent increase, and if they are from $1,200 to $1,800 they get a 5 per cent increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

National Training School for Girls: Superintendent, $1,200; treasurer, matron, and 4 teachers, at $600 each; overseer, $720; 2 parole officers, at $600 each; 7 teachers of industries, at $480 each; engineer, $720; assistant engineer, $600; night watchman, $480; 2 laborers, at $300 each; in all, $12,480.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in line 22, page 81, the paragraph just read, I offer an amendment to insert a hyphen at the end of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 81, line 22, at the end of the line insert a hyphen.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum: For care and treatment of indigent patients, under a contract to be made with Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum by the Board of Charities, not to exceed $20,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill what system is pursued in reference to these indigent lying-in cases? Is there a contract by which the physician gets so much?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There is a contract by which they are assigned by the Board of Charities to this hospital under a contract price, and that contract price is, adults, $1.20 a day, and infants, 40 cents a day.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman know whether any investigation has been made as to whether this is abused? My reason for asking the question is this: We have a similar provision in the city of New York—of course, covering a great many more hospitals—by which the hospital gets $25 for each case, not to exceed $8,000 in the aggregate per hospital. We found, I regret to say, and very much to my surprise, that many women who could have afforded to be taken care of during this trying time not only in comfort but in luxury in their own homes actually go as indigent patients to these hospitals to be cared for.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have heard of no cases of abuse along that line here. Of course, this hospital takes in a great many pay patients.

Mr. BENNET. Does anybody in the District of Columbia, any official body, ever investigate these matters?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There is a body, a board of directors or managers, constituted under the law, consisting of two Members of this House and one Member of the Senate, the Surgeon General of the Army and the Surgeon General of the Navy, and various other prominent people connected with the Government, and the commissioners are also, I think, members of the board, at least a part of them, who are supposed not only to be the governing but the regulating body.

Mr. BENNET. Of the hospital?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Of the hospital.

Mr. BENNET. But what I had more particularly in mind, and we found this necessary from time to time in New York City—and I suppose they have in other cities—does anybody corresponding, for instance, to the comptroller of the city of New York, who is our financial officer, or the commissioner of accounts, or investigating officer—is there anybody in the District government charged with the official duty of investigating this character of expenditure of the people's money?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. All these expenditures through the Board of Charities are audited, as I understand, by the auditor of the District of Columbia—that is, so far as the accounts are concerned. Now, as to any investigation by anybody charged with an oversight or investigation as to whether or not the Board of Charities, in making these assignments, send to this hospital at public expense people who are not indigent or people who are abundantly able to pay their own hospital fees, I think not. I think that matter has no supervision other than by the Board of Charities.

Mr. BENNET. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in this city of 350,000 people—is it not?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It has about that population.

Mr. BENNET. Here is an expenditure of $92,500 for what might be called dispensary purposes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman he can supplement his figures, in another bill that will be reported to this House. The sundry civil bill carries an appropriation to the Providence Hospital of $19,000 and to the Garfield Hospital of $19,000 for care, under contract, of indigent patients.

Mr. BENNET. That is $38,000 more.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. That is $130,000 for dispensary service. I have no objection if it is spent for indigent people. But it does seem to me a fairly large expenditure for a city that is not one of the largest. I just wanted to find out whether there was any official corresponding to the comptroller of the city of New York, whose duty it was to do what the comptroller and the commissioner of accounts of New York City do—that is, investigate if these expenditures are properly made.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. These accounts are all audited. As to these people who are supposed to be indigent and who make applications to the Board of Charities for treatment in these hospitals, their cases are looked into by some employee of the Board of Charities before they take them to the hospital.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The Board of Charities, I will say to the gentleman, is appointed by the President of the United States. It is one of those mix-ups that we get in this particular jurisdiction, where we have a school board appointed by the Justices of the Supreme Court, a Board of Charities appointed by the President of the United States, and a recorder of wills and a recorder of deeds appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. BENNET. And irremovable assistant assessors?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; and all these go out when you try to remedy the matter by a point of order. And the gentleman can see it is very hard even when a man tries to spend all his time to get clearly in his mind even the administration of all this intricate system we have worked up here by patchwork in the District of Columbia; but I can say to him positively there is a very strict and close supervision of the character of patients, as to whether or not they are indigent, that are assigned to these various hospitals.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, the gentleman says the accounts are audited, but the gentleman and I both know what that means. Here is an appropriation, we will say—the one we are now discussing—of $20,000. The superintendent, or some one else, of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum certifies in accordance with the contract with the Board of Charities that they have treated so many women in accordance with the contract, and when that certificate comes up to the auditor, if there is an unexpended balance in the appropriation, he has no function except to audit it?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. None whatever.

Mr. BENNET. It is a proper appropriation, a proper contract, authorized by law, a certified service, and all he has left to do is to multiply?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Except, it may be added to the gentleman's statement, the Board of Charities makes some review of all these expenditures.

Mr. BENNET. Well, without criticizing the Board of Charities—I do not know who they are——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They are very eminent gentlemen in the city of Washington.

Mr. BENNET. I have no doubt that they are among the best men that could have been selected. But is it a paid function?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It is not a paid function; it is voluntary service.

Mr. BENNET. Then they probably give it more or less casual attention?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman, incidentally, that while we were preparing the appropriation bill at the last session of Congress this eminent body of men came before us and asked if we could not dispense with the Board of Charities and relieve them of the obligations.

Mr. BENNET. It does seem to me—of course the gentleman and I are not going to be here very long, and I regret it so far as the gentleman is concerned——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The same to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. But it has always seemed to me that we, coming from different parts of the country, the 435 of us, ought at times to bend our energies toward making the government of the city of Washington a model city government, and if we find there is anything missing possibly we are not wasting the time of the House if we call the attention of those who are to succeed us at least to an omission in the government.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I can say to the gentleman that among the many regrets that I may have when I retire to private life one will not be that I have not made an earnest effort to better the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENNET. We all know that the gentleman has done that. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to strike out the last word, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], by his suggestion, might lead us to believe that in New York City—which by the way I would hardly take as a model of city government as against the administration of the city of Washington—when somebody goes to a hospital as a charity patient, the comptroller sends out a lot of agents and finds out what the man's condition is, and does something more than merely pass upon the account. But the comptroller is nothing but an auditor, usually with a little higher power. The comptroller in New York City, I apprehend, does nothing more to these accounts than the auditor does here, unless he has a lot of personal representatives—which would not be improbable under Tammany control—to send out and make an investigation at an expense of a thousand dollars to see if they are to expend $2 on the patient.

The Board of Charities of this city is one of the best boards in the United States. I have never seen any official, except the gentleman on the floor of this House from New York City, that I would rather intrust with an affair than the members who constitute the Board of Charities in Washington. They are very competent men, rendering a splendid service, just as many men render splendid service throughout the country in official positions, and they often do it on school boards where other officials are paid who are elected to office. Here men who desire to have preferment in office in Washington as a rule can not seek some office which pays a salary. Some of them accept offices which do not pay salaries and perform their services well. I know some members of the Board of Charities here, and I frequently take occasion to discuss with them the situation in Washington under their control, and I think I never have found any body of men who did their work apparently better, with more disinterested patriotism, than does the Board of Charities in Washington.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three or four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, as I said before in my remarks, I do not know even who the present members of the board are. My criticism is as to a defect in the system. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has a very wide knowledge of many subjects, but one of the omissions in his knowledge is as to the powers of the comptroller of the city of New York. Incidentally he seems to have forgotten for the moment—because I take it for granted that he knows—that for the last seven years the comptroller of the city of New York has been an anti-Tammany comptroller, and that since 1901 the comptroller in office has been more frequently an anti-Tammany official than a Tammany official. As a matter of fact, the city of New York has ceased to be a Democratic Gibraltar, and we are just as apt to elect on the general ticket in the coming municipal campaign in 1917 an anti-Tammany ticket as a Tammany ticket.

The comptroller has precisely the functions that I indicated he has. The commissioner of charities can make contracts in New York City similar to those evidently authorized by law in the District of Columbia, for which we are appropriating here, but the comptroller has the power not merely to audit, but to send his representatives, of whom, as the gentleman from Illinois happily guessed, he has many, into the various institutions to find out how the contracts are being carried out. And in a city which does as this city does, spending the something like $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 as carried in this bill, there ought to be somebody who has the power beyond the mere auditing of an account to pass upon the character and propriety of contracts entered into by a board, and especially unpaid boards; because, while I do not doubt for a moment that the gentlemen, and possible the ladies, who compose the Board of Charities are very excellent people, nevertheless we all know from our own experience that busy people who accept unsalaried positions are quite apt to delegate responsibility to the salaried officials under them. It can not do any harm to have commissioners of accounts, as they have in New York, and I have no doubt as they have in Chicago, or to confer upon somebody in the District the same powers that are exercised by our comptroller, or the powers that some official in Chicago exercises, I will hazard the guess, even though I have a good deal of ignorance on the subject.

Why, under our city charter if a man makes a contract with the city of New York for the furnishing of supplies at a certain price and the comptroller of the city of New York finds out that that contract was at a higher price than the market value, or than a reasonable value, the city can defend a lawsuit based upon the contract, and can confine the man who furnishes the supplies to a reasonable or market value of the supplies. In other words, we have attempted in every possible way to hedge about the treasury, and it seems to me that while very possibly the government of the city of Washington is superior to the government either of the city of Chicago or of New York—and I do not hazard an opinion in either case—nevertheless when we find in either city some one good thing whereby we are discharging a public duty and exercising a public function and call the attention of this House, which is the board of aldermen of the District of Columbia, to the fact that somewhere in New York or even in Chicago there exists a better municipal plan than that which is being used in the city of Washington we ought to be willing to consider it on its merits with an open mind. For instance, I asked the gentleman a moment ago in relation to the widowed mother. We have, and it is very possible they have in Chicago—they lead in many things there—we have in New York City a provision to prevent the disruption of families, which does not exist here in Washington. If a woman, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] says, has a child whom she is unable to support, the only thing she can do is to send that child to an institution; a necessary thing, but a cruel thing to the child. We provide in the city of New York that a woman similarly circumstanced can, under proper regulation, receive the same amount of money for the same child, to be applied to the support of that child in the home, because, although we may be mistaken about it, we do have the opinion that the foundation of society is the home, a proper home, and that money expended for a child is far better expended in keeping the home of that child intact than to spend a similar sum to maintain that child, possibly with more food, more clothes, under a better roof in the best-managed public institution that any city in the world ever saw, and I think that is a splendid idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, just a word.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. In justice to my own great home State of Pennsylvania I wish to say that we have in operation in that Commonwealth now what is known as the mothers' pension law, which provides for the care of children, or an allowance for the children, so that families may not be broken up; and I wish to add that it is working most successfully, and we are very proud of that measure. It was suggested and became a law as a consequence of the broad and humane activities of a former Member of this body, Hon. John K. Tener, who as governor signed the bill, thereby still further endearing him in the hearts of the people as a man of humanity and who believes in not only talking about but applying social justice.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in my time, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I believe the gentleman is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which has jurisdiction over legislation relating to the District.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Has the gentleman tried to put that system in operation in the District of Columbia?

Mr. FOCHT. I have not heard anything of that. We have not had a meeting of the committee recently. When we have a meeting of the committee I shall be very glad to offer a bill of that kind. If the gentleman would assist in having a gathering of the members of that committee sometime, I would be very glad to offer such a bill.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that I am not a member of that committee. If that committee were a little more active, possibly I might be relieved of a great many of my own embarrassments in connection with this appropriation bill.

Mr. FOCHT. I think if the committee has been derelict it can not be charged to me. In any event, I will feel it a great privilege to offer to Congress a bill which will make adequate and systematic provision for dependent mothers and their children to supplant the present haphazard method employed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of indorsing all that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said about the personnel of the Board of Charities. They are people not only very eminent in the District, but people whose character would be a guaranty of their proper supervision of any public function that they should assume. The board now consists of Mr. D. J. Kaufman, Mr. John Joy Edson, Mr. George M. Kober, Mr. George E. Hamilton, and Dr. John Van Schaick. The calling of the names of these gentlemen is a guaranty that, as far as they can, they are looking after the charities of the District of Columbia properly. Of course, I can not answer the definite questions asked by my friend from New York Mr. BENNET, but I have very great faith in the proper administration of those funds under this board.

The Clerk read to line 10, on page 83.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, referring to line 8 on page 83, I offer an amendment to insert a hyphen at the end of that line.

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It is not necessary, but it is usual.

Mr. MANN. There will not be any hyphen there when the bill is engrossed, anyhow. It is only the division of the word "agreement" at the end of the line.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DEWALT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 407) entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tuberculosis Hospital: Superintendent, $1,800; resident physician, $600; assistant resident physician, $300; roentgenologist, $600; pharmacist and clerk, superintendent of nurses, and engineer, at $720 each; pathologist, $300; matron, dietician, chief cook, assistant engineer, laundryman, and 8 graduate nurses, at $600 each; assistant cooks—1 $360, 2 at $240 each; assistant engineer, $480; elevator conductor, $300; 3 laundresses, at $240 each; farmer, laborer, night watchman, 4 orderlies, and assistant laundryman, at $360 each; 3 ward maids, at $240 each; 4 servants, at $240 each; in all, $20,460.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of displaying a little more ignorance. What is the office described in the first word on the first line of page 84?

Mr. MANN. What word?

Mr. BENNET. Roentgenologist.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. He is the man who operates the X-ray machine.

Mr. BENNET. I thank the gentleman very much.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President on December 21, 1916, had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8816. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Navigation to cause the sailing vessel Golden Gate to be registered as a vessel of the United States; and

H. R. 9856. An act granting to the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co., and to the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association, and to the Manufacturers' Railway Co. permission to transfer certain rights of easement for railway purposes heretofore granted by the United States to the St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railroad Co. and to the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association, respectively.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For board and care of all children committed to the guardianship of said board by the courts of the District, and for temporary care of children pending investigation or while being transferred from place to place, with authority to pay not more than $1,500 to institutions adjudged to be under sectarian control and not more than $400 for burial of children dying while under charge of the board, $80,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina about the provision—

Not more than $400 for burial of children dying while under charge of the board.

Has the gentleman any idea how many children there are under the care of the board?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. On July 1, 1915, there were 1,930 children under the care of the board—1,677 permanent wards of the board and 33 were on the roll as feeble-minded. There were 183 temporary wards, and 17 of them were on the roll as feeble-minded. The aggregate is 1,930.

Mr. BENNET. At the average mortality rate amongst children I suppose the number of deaths would be somewhere around 25 to every 1,000. That would be somewhere around 50 children under the care of this board that might be expected to die in a year.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I can not answer that question, but I will say to the gentleman that this limitation was placed in the bill at the suggestion of the people who are administering this fund. If there has ever been any deficit, they have never so reported to the committee.

Mr. BENNET. It indicates one of two things—either a very low rate of mortality, which would be very highly desirable——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Let us hope so. During the year 1916 they spent only $50 of this appropriation; so there must be a very small mortality.

Mr. BENNET. Only $50 for the burial of children?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; that is embodied in their report.

Mr. BENNET. Then we must really assume that the deficit is made up by voluntary contributions, because we all know that the mortality rate is greater than that.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I assume that the burial expenses of a number of the children who die are paid by private subscription or from some other fund, possibly of the institution in which they die; but the demand upon this fund of $400 during the last fiscal year for which we have a report was only $50.

Mr. BENNET. The other items in connection with the appropriation seem to be usual, and very possibly generous, but it strikes me that this item is small out of all proportion.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am not surprised that it attracted the attention of the gentleman, but, as a matter of fact, the reports to the committee show that they have never expended this amount, or anything like it.

Mr. BENNET. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care and maintenance of children under a contract to be made with the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children by the Board of Children's Guardians, not to exceed $9,900.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if it is not possible that the colored children of the District do have the benefit of just the system described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself. This language would seem to indicate it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do not think these children are left with their mothers. I think that if they are cared for they are cared for by some arrangement made with the Board of Charities and not in their own homes.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman have any knowledge about it?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do not. I want to say that while the gentlemen are mentioning this matter that almost every county in North Carolina apportions this indigent fund in the home.

Mr. BENNET. In the rural portions of New York State in the towns the overseer of the poor apportions the money to people in their homes. It is not anything new, but in these huge aggregations that we call cities, with their impersonal character, there has been in the past a sort of unconscious cruelty to children.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The Clerk has just given me the information, and I will answer the gentleman's first question. This fund is all expended for children and none for women, and is administered through the organization. This must be expended under the law for children.

Mr. BENNET. But it is not expended to keep them in their homes, as is done in the gentleman's county and almost all rural counties in the United States.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It is not. I am entirely safe in saying that none of this fund is expended in that way.

Mr. BENNET. Then, I regret it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Relief of the poor: For relief of the poor, including pay of physicians to the poor at not exceeding $1 per day each, who shall be appointed by the commissioners on the recommendation of the health officer, $12,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, somewhat confidentially, how he would feel toward an increase of that appropriation if in any way it could be attached to a provision permitting the care of indigent children in their homes?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman with perfect candor and without being confidential about it that without time to prepare a proper provision that would not be too far-reaching—there are so many institutions and so many instrumentalities connected with this matter that it is impossible to take care of all of them without careful preparation. I am in sympathy with the idea of the gentleman, and I hope all that has been said this morning may bring it before some Congress in the future in concrete form that may embrace all the institutions. As much confidence as I have in the gentleman's ability, and somewhat in my own, I do not think we ought to attempt it on the floor. There are a number of items scattered through the bill and a number of agencies through which the funds might be expended. I think it would be a little bit dangerous, and I think the gentleman will agree with me.

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman is correct. I will do one thing before I leave Congress, and leave it as a legacy to the successors of the gentleman and myself—I will introduce a bill embodying that proposition that can be taken up by somebody else at some other time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think it would be a great help to those who come after us.

Mr. BENNET. I think it ought to be done, and I think the gentleman realizes that in the rural portions of the country the people have saved a great many useful children to the community by having them cared for in connection with private homes and not delivered over to the somewhat bare, cheerless, and unemotional care of the general public. It has to be done some time, but it should be avoided whenever it can be possibly done.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman will make his contribution for the benefit of those who serve here in the future.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the commissioners, in any case where special assessments, school tuition charges, rents, fees, or collections of any character have been erroneously covered into the Treasury to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts, to refund such erroneous payments, wholly or in part, including the refunding of fees paid for building permits authorized by the District of Columbia appropriation act approved March 2, 1911, $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for such refunds of payments made within the past three years.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 93, line 12, at the end of the line, add the letter "l," so that it will read "special."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For distribution branch: Superintendent, $3,300; engineer, $2,400; assistant engineers—1 $1,800, 1 $1,700; master mechanic (who shall also act as a member of the board of examiners of steam engineers, without additional compensation), $2,300; foreman, $1,800; assistant foremen—1 $1,275, 1 $1,200, 1 $1,125, 1 $900; steam engineers—chief $1,750, 2 at $1,100 each, 3 assistants at $1,000 each; chief inspector of valves, $1,600; leveler, $1,200; inspector, $1,200; draftsman, $1,050; clerks—1 $1,800, 1 $1,500, 4 at $1,200 each, stores clerk $1,500, 1 $1,000, 1 $900; timekeeper, $900; 2 rodmen at $900 each; 2 chainmen at $675 each; 4 oilers at $610 each; 3 firemen at $875 each; janitor, $900; watchmen—1 $875, 1 $700, 1 $610; drivers—1 $700, 1 $630; 2 messengers, at $600 each; in all, $91,330.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the language on page 96, lines 18, 19, and 20, relating to the master mechanic, for the purpose of getting some information.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the increase in salary in line 20, page 96.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to make the point of order or to reserve it?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order against the increase of salary from $2,000 to $2,300 in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 90, line 20, after the word "compensation," insert the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order that I reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the extension of and maintaining the high-service system of water distribution, laying necessary service and trunk mains for low service, and purchasing, installing, and maintaining water meters on services to such private residences and to such business places as may not be required to install meters under existing regulations as may be directed by the commissioners, said meters at all times to remain the property of the District of Columbia, to include all necessary land, machinery, buildings, mains, and appurtenances, and labor, and purchase and maintenance of horses, wagons, carts, and harness necessary for the proper execution of this work, not to exceed $340,000 of the amount available in the water fund during the fiscal year 1918 after providing for the expenditures hereinbefore authorized.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BORLAND: Insert as a new paragraph, page 98, following line 13, the following:

"No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any executive department of the Government of the city of Washington which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day."

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. If members of the Committee on Appropriations desire to delay business, then I shall insist upon having a quorum present.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken——

Mr. MANN. I am not willing to let that matter be disposed of without a quorum of the House.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I shall not withdraw the point of order unless the amendment is withdrawn. I do not purpose that this amendment shall be disposed of by 50 Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-seven Members present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 19119, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 239 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he reported the list of absentees to be entered in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask to modify my amendment by the following language, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to modify the amendment in the manner indicated. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13, page 98, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any department appropriated for herein which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is an application to the District of Columbia in its clerical force in the executive departments of the principle of the amendment which I introduced to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. My understanding is that the clerks in the District offices work only seven hours a day, but are entitled to the Saturday half holidays three months in the year, to the 12 or 13 national holidays, to the 30 days' sick leave, and to the 30 days' annual leave. In other words, they are on a par with the clerks in the executive departments. It is simply and solely a question of business efficiency, of whether we want an efficient administration. I might personally go a little further than that. I think it involves not only efficiency in the public service, but I think it involves honesty in the public service, because, as I pointed out the other day, a large number of the civil-service employees outside of the District of Columbia work more than eight hours a day, and none of them, so far as I know, work less than eight hours a day.

I saw not very long ago a very able speech by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON] referring to the work of the meat inspectors in the great packing houses of the country. I know something personally about those employees, but I was surprised to see him state in there and give instances of men and crews whose time had been kept showing that none of them worked less than 8 hours, and that a great majority worked 9, 10, and 11 hours a day. Now that is true in the departments outside of Washington. For some reason or other there has grown up a custom here in Washington, a custom against the full standard eight-hour day. That custom ought to be reversed, and I think that if the business men, the farmers, the taxpayers of this country ever get a clear-cut understanding of that situation they will insist that it shall be reversed. They will insist that we shall not expend the Government taxes unless we get a fair, honest, and proper return in labor for it. This bill does involve an increase of over a quarter million dollars in the running expenses of the District government; over a quarter million dollars—not all of that is increase in offices where their pay is increased, but some of it is unquestionably. We are asked constantly to increase the burden upon the taxpayers of the country for the government of the District of Columbia at a time when we need all the Federal revenues for very urgent and imperative and unavoidable expenditures. I think we have a right, not only a right, but I will say in all earnestness it is our duty in governing the District of Columbia to see that we govern it according to the accepted business principles throughout the country. It does not seem to me there can be any particular reason why any particular set of Federal employees should have any particular favor over any other set of employees. I do not believe there is a man here who, if he were clothed with authority over a large body of men as a representative or manager or agent of a great corporation, representing the trustees and stockholders of that corporation, would think for a minute of spending the stockholders' money for services of that kind. He would consider in his conscience that he had a higher duty of fidelity to his stockholders than that.

The duty which we owe to the taxpayers of the United States is exactly commensurate; indeed, it might be higher than the duty a manager of a great corporation owes to the men who put him in that position of trust. So I think, in this case at least, it would be very well for us to establish the principle of the eight-hour day. Most of us have been defending on the stump for the last three months the eight-hour day. Most of us believe in it. We believe it is a scientific principle of social justice. We believe in the eight-hour provision for labor, eight hours for recreation and meals, and eight hours for repose. If a man has the proper conception of his obligation when he engages in the service of his fellow citizens and country, paid out of their taxes, taxes drawn from their pockets, he ought to be willing to do that, and I have enough belief in the men in the public service to believe that the great majority of them would be and are willing, if Congress expresses the will, to abide by the will of Congress and work eight hours a day.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] when he originally offered this amendment affecting all the employees, not only those of the District of Columbia but those employed by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia or appropriated for in the bill on which he attempted to place his amendment, I supported it. But I am not willing, Mr. Chairman, that this House, having refused to enact his amendment into law as it affects the employees of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia and outside of the District of Columbia, that he should try this particular remedy on the employees of the District of Columbia who are appropriated for in this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. In one moment. Some gentleman the other day, in discussing the tendency of men in the House to experiment with legislation and all other kinds of things upon the District of Columbia, spoke a parable. There are men in this House who are constantly attempting to try something on the District of Columbia in order that it may be ideal or that somebody may copy it elsewhere. As one Member having in charge the making of appropriations for employment within the District of Columbia, I do not care to submit to this dose of medicine for these people who are represented by these appropriations, and I very much hope that this committee will vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. I am very glad to acknowledge that the gentleman supported the amendment on a previous occasion, and I acknowledge his views and principles about them. I simply want to ask him if he supported it because it was right? I know he did. If it was right in that case, why is it not right in this case?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Because it is not right to place upon these employees the services that you do not place upon other employees.

Mr. BORLAND. But we do place the burden upon employees elsewhere in the United States.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. This House has taken action as affecting other employees in Washington. My plea is to treat the employees of the District the same as the employees in the Federal departments in the District of Columbia. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BORLAND. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the services of draftsmen, assistant engineers, levelers, transitmen, rodmen, chainmen, computers, copyists, overseers, and inspectors temporarily required in connection with sewer, street, street cleaning or road work, or construction and repair of buildings and bridges, or any general or special engineering or construction work authorized by appropriations may be employed exclusively to carry into effect said appropriations when specifically and in writing ordered by the commissioners, and all such necessary expenditures for the proper execution of said work shall be paid from and equitably charged against the sums appropriated for said work; and the commissioners in their annual estimates shall report the number of such employees performing such services, and their work, and the sums paid to each, and out of what appropriation: Provided, That the expenditures hereunder shall not exceed $80,000 during the fiscal year 1918.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the reason that in the RECORD this morning appears, under extension of remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], who knows nothing of the bill, a portion of a statement made by the editor of the Journal of the American Institute of Architects, which is an attack upon the pending public-buildings bill.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that matters might stand in statu quo until this bill came before the House, when I might have an opportunity to fully explain it and discuss it; but the misrepresentations of the bill come so thick and fast, and are so utterly indefensible, that I find myself called upon now to say a word or two in reference to it.

I believe the best time to nail a lie is to nail it when it is fresh, and this statement I do not hesitate to say is a tissue of lies from one end to the other. Mr. Chairman, the fact of it is that this whole fight upon the pending public-buildings bill is not a fight as against authorizations for small towns, but it is a fight to take from Congress its right to legislate in this regard and to pass it into the hands of a budget committee of bureaucrats in the department.

Now, for instance, this man makes the statement, boldly and baldly, that in this pending bill there are in some cases sites provided for towns where the postal receipts are less than $3,000. That is an absolute, bald, unsupported, snaggle-tooth, and unqualified falsehood, no matter from whom it comes. He makes the statement, and undertakes to have the public believe it, that items are incorporated in this bill for towns with practically no population and no postal receipts of any consequence whatsoever. It is an ingeniously drawn statement, because he states that Members of Congress—some of them mentioned by name—have introduced bills for this town, that town, and the other town, stating the population and the postal receipts, and undertaking to leave the impression upon the public that those items are included in the bill, when the fact is none of them are. He makes the statement that our late, lamented colleague, Mr. Tribble, of Georgia, for instance, introduced bills for 14 different towns, when the record shows that he introduced bills for 5 towns, and no more. And this man goes further and states that in all these provisions for sites there is in scarcely one instance any actual facts which offer any evidence that any of these 100 communities need a new building; and yet included within the 100 are such places as Chicago, Boston, Detroit, Little Rock, Montgomery, Ala., and cities of that character all over the country.

This bill carries about $28,000,000 of authorizations instead of $35,000,000, as is promiscuously charged. About $22,000,000 of it goes to the large cities and cities where there are Federal activities other than the post office, and only about $6,000,000 of it goes to the post-office towns throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Only about $6,000,000 goes to the smaller towns scattered over the country. That is at the rate of $1,500,000 a year for the post-office towns in the United States. The last bill passed was on March 4, 1913. It carried a provision of law that no town where there were no Federal activities other than the post office should be entitled to a building until it had $10,000 of postal receipts, and no town with no Federal activity save the post office should be entitled to a site unless there was $6,000 of annual post-office receipts. That is the law of the land, and this committee has hewed to the line in the framing of the bill under that law. There are a few cases where sites had already been secured for places with receipts of less than $10,000 per annum, for which this bill carries authorizations for buildings, on the theory that as the Government owned the land it had as well be utilized. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I shall cover the whole question in every item when this bill comes before the House. I shall discuss every item in it. The bill will be thrown open for amendment and for discussion by all the opponents of the bill who desire to avail themselves of either privilege, but I want to say now, and I want the House and the country to understand, that two objects are involved in the fight upon this bill. One is to take the jurisdiction to legislate away from Congress and turn it over to a bunch of bureaucrats, giving them a lump-sum appropriation and allowing them to say where the buildings shall go; and the other is to defeat this bill and later on to come to the committee with a lot of emergency propositions for the great cities and force use to bring out a bill covering them only. As one member of this committee, and only one, I want to say that I shall never vote for a bill that contemplates only the great cities of the country. If the rural districts can not be taken care of and their mail facilities can not be protected, as one member of this committee, I will never bring out a bill to take care only of the great cities of the land. [Applause.]

We invite the enemies of this legislation to the contest. We are ready to defend every item in this bill. Let them meet us upon this floor in open and fair debate when the bill comes up for consideration, and may right and justice prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All per diem employees and day laborers of the District of Columbia who have been continuously employed for five working days next preceding such days as are legal holidays in the District of Columbia, and whose employment continues through and beyond said legal holidays, may, in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, be granted leave of absence with pay for said legal holidays.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to make a statement in justification of the committee for bringing in this piece of legislation in the bill.

There are in the employment of the District of Columbia somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,600 people, and more than 2,000 of those are on the per diem roll. These people have absolutely no leave of absence, not even the legal holidays—five of them—with the exception of Labor Day. Only on one day out of all the legal holidays of the year have they leave of absence, whereas the employees of the Federal Government, of course, even the per diem employees, have all these days that we are undertaking to give to the per diem employees of the District of Columbia. We felt that it was a matter of nothing more than justice and right.

Of course, it is subject to a point of order, and I shall not make any contention along that line. I merely wanted to make a justification of the committee's action.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think these per diem employees who are practically employed by the year ought to have legal holidays, but——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. From an examination of the per diem roll of the District of Columbia I will say that out of the more than 2,000 men who are on the per diem roll, less than 500 of them—much less than 500 of them—would constitute the number that are not at work practically the whole year. They are practically on the annual roll.

Mr. MANN. I expect that they ought to be paid higher wages than they are getting.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Well, some of them are well paid for their services.

Mr. MANN. Under this provision, if the District Commissioners want to employ anybody this week, they will get an extra day's pay. If they want to employ somebody next week, they will get an extra day's pay. But usually they do not.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I want to make an appeal to the gentleman. Just a few moments ago he voted with me to keep from putting upon the District employees a burden that was not placed upon the employees of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia. We are attempting now to do exactly the same thing that he and myself and others voted to do a while ago, merely to give them the same opportunity that the per diem employees in the Federal Government have.

Mr. MANN. This gives them more opportunity than they have anywhere else in the Government.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. In the isolated instances of a few men that may be true.

Mr. MANN. If the provision applied practically only to the per diem employees who are employed for months at a time I would not oppose it, but that is not the case. I am bound to make the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to persuade the gentleman against his judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That hereafter copies of all estimates of appropriations in any way affecting the revenues of the District of Columbia shall be furnished to the commissioners of said District on or before October 1 of each year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order.

Mr. MANN. What will be the effect of this? What will be the effect if the other departments have to furnish the District Commissioners with certain estimates by the 1st of October—probably before they are prepared?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that this provision was put in because of the law governing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in the amounts for which they can make estimates. They are required under the law to forward their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury not later than the 15th of October.

Mr. MANN. They are in the same fix that the other departments are.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly, the other departments which estimate in other bills for expenditures in the District of Columbia. Therefore they can not comply with the law.

Mr. MANN. Nobody complies with the law.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. We were undertaking to have one body who would comply with the law.

Mr. MANN. The other people could not comply with the law. The various departments make up their estimates as soon as they can. They will not make them up earlier simply because there is one item or because there are a few items relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. As the gentleman says, there are only a few of them—half a dozen, possibly—outside of those that are estimated for in these estimates. They, nevertheless, amount to a considerable sum of money, although in the number of items they are few. We do not think it would work any hardship on any of the other departments to let the commissioners have this information 15 days in advance. It would enable them to comply with the law.

Mr. MANN. I can not see any harm in letting the commissioners have the information, but——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. What possible harm would it be to try?

Mr. MANN. The only possible harm any of these things would do would be the harm that comes from passing a law that can not be executed.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am sure that if this does not have the effect it is intended to have the next bill will not carry it. For instance——

Mr. MANN. Here is the situation: These commissioners are appointed by the President of the United States. He has full authority over all the other departments of the Government. All he has to do is to tell the head of the War Department, through his personal aide, whom he sees every day, who makes most of these estimates in other bills, to send in his estimates at the proper time to the District Commissioners, and it will be done. We may pass laws galore, but they will pay no attention to them. But if the President tells them to do it, they will do it. They are under him.

It is a good deal like what I read in the paper the other day, how the President was going to "scan" all the appropriation bills to see that there are no items in them which ought to be omitted. Why, it is his duty under the law to "scan" the estimates of his departments, and there never were such extravagant—grossly extravagant—estimates as those that have been submitted at this session of Congress. Yet the newspapers say that the President is going to "scan" the appropriations. I do not suppose he was responsible for it. If he was, he was probably indulging in "hot air" at a newspaper conference.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. What the gentleman says would appeal to my judgment if the President had nothing else to do except to send word to the Secretary of War, by his personal aide. But the gentleman knows that the Department of Justice and other departments do have items that go in other bills, that they estimate for, that are paid out of the District revenues. This very year the commissioners sent in estimates for the District of Columbia that added to the amounts that were estimated for to be expended out of District revenues by other departments, which exceeded the amount fixed by law that could be estimated, to wit, more than twice the estimated revenues of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1918. The effort of this committee was, without putting any hardship upon anybody, to give the commissioners at least an opportunity to have before them the full estimates before they submitted theirs to the Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while I am not convinced, I am going to take the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to come in just before section 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 102, by inserting, after line 21, the following:

"SEC. 6. That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees (other than employees of the public schools, police department, fire department, and employees to whom subsistence is furnished) who receive salaries at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and for increased compensation at the rate of 5 per cent per annum to employees (other than employees of the public schools, police department, fire department, and employees to whom subsistence is furnished) who receive salaries at a rate not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, and for increased compensation at the rate of 5 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate less than $1,200 per annum and to whom subsistence is furnished, so much as may be necessary is appropriated: Provided, That this section shall only apply to employees who are appropriated for in this act specifically and in lump sums: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of its next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order.

Mr. HOWARD. I rose for the purpose of reserving a point of order myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia both reserve points of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to make any extended statement in regard to the amendment that I have just offered. Of course, the House is familiar with the provision that was adopted the other day as it related to those employed in the Federal service and appropriated for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. This provision follows exactly in that line, so far as the percentage of increase is concerned, and the division between those who shall receive 10 per cent and those who shall receive a 5 per cent increase.

The amendment that has just been read excludes from the provisions of this increase the members of the Metropolitan police force, the members of the fire department, and the public-school teachers of the District of Columbia. These exceptions are made for reasons that seemed to your committee to be good. In the current appropriation bill, enacted at the last session of Congress, there was a revision of the salaries of the members of the Metropolitan police force, and almost a reorganization of that force in the matter of salaries, by which they were increased more than 10 per cent per annum. They were also provided with certain retirement privileges, with pensions, opportunities that they had not had before. In connection with the fire department we have already in this very bill increased the compensation of the active units of that department, those receiving more than $1,200, 5 per cent and more, and those receiving less than $1,200, 10 per cent and more.

As to the public-school teachers, those who are familiar with the law under which the public schools are organized and the regulations for the compensation of teachers in the public schools, know that they receive additional compensation this year. Those who enter the service at $500 receive an additional $25 each year for five years. Those who enter at $600 receive an additional compensation of $25 a year for five years. Those in class 3, who enter the service at $650, receive an automatic increase of $25 per year until they reach $900. Those who are in class 4, starting with a basic salary of $800, receive automatic increases of $30 each year until they reach an annual compensation of $1,100. Those in class 5, who enter at $950 as a basic salary, receive an automatic increase of $40 each year until a salary of $1,350 is reached, and those who enter class 6, at a basic salary of $1,000, receive, after two years' service, automatic increases of $100 a year until the salary reaches the figure of $2,200.

So, Mr. Chairman, the school teachers of the District of Columbia receive not only during the next fiscal year, for which this paragraph is operative, an amount equal to the amount that we are giving other employees of the District over the current year, but they will continue to receive a like increase next year, and so they do every year under the provisions of the law of 1906, and no injustice is done these people by their exclusion from this amendment that has been offered.

I do not know that it is necessary or that I care to say anything more as to the amendment. I merely wanted to let members of the committee know that your committee did not discriminate against certain employees of the District of Columbia, but had excluded them only because these benefits that are proposed now to be given to other employees of the District of Columbia have already been given to those excepted from this amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the chairman of the committee would bring in or permit an amendment which would include the teachers of the District in the proposed percentage increase. For myself, I see no force in the argument just made by the gentleman from North Carolina. If teachers be appointed into the public-school system of the District of Columbia at a salary of $500—and there are some in the service at that rate—they have to work one year before receiving the increase of $25. Is that correct?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What are they to do on $500 a year in Washington in order to live as teachers ought to live when prices are as high as they are? Government employees getting $550 or $600 in this city are to receive a 10 per cent increase. But school-teachers working for only $500 a year are to receive no increase during the year, because during the next year they will get $25 more.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. But under the law teachers have an increase of pay every year, not only the next year but the year thereafter and the year after that, and go into the next grade.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The total that teachers in this class would receive during the first year is only $500. While the other employees receiving $550 will receive an increase of 10 per cent, or $55.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I want to say to the gentleman that out of the 1,888 teachers in the public schools in Washington there are only 86 in the class who are started on the basic pay of $500.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The smallness of the number of the teachers in this class has nothing whatever to do with the justice of the argument. To me there is not the slightest force in that statement of the gentleman. Eighty-six is a considerable number of teachers. But if there were only one teacher receiving $500, that teacher would be entitled to the raise given to the other employees in this District working for the same salary. It is not the number, compelled in these times of exorbitantly high prices for the necessaries of life, to work for meager, inadequate wages, that ought to determine our duty.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I want to suggest to the gentleman, and possibly he has thought of it, that these school-teachers, while he is comparing them with the other employees in the District of Columbia—none of these teachers work more than 9 months in the year and they draw a salary for 12 months. Does that impress the gentleman?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; it does not. [Laughter.] Why, the gentleman must understand the claim of the teachers that during the hot weather in Washington they are entitled to a vacation. Does the gentleman relinquish his salary or any portion of it, or will he consent to have his salary reduced because there are months each year when, instead of being here in Washington, he is having a vacation at home? No; nothing is said about that; but when it comes to the school-teacher in the city of Washington working for $500 a year, gentlemen arise and demand a reason why a teacher who does not teach in this city during the hot summer months after having taught all the other months should receive any more.

There are no other persons in secular life save, perhaps, editors who are honest, able, and public-spirited, who perform a service of such tremendous value to the people of the United States as do the school-teachers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more, and I ask it because of the interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. On condition that the gentleman will submit to other interruptions, I shall not object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will submit to them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Outside of the city of Racine, how many school-teachers in the gentleman's district get $500 a year?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know how many receive $500 a year; but that question has nothing to do with the merits of the proposition I am discussing. The gentleman from New York is a very solicitous guardian of the public funds; but his question is without force when analyzed in the light of the facts. I answer it by saying that perhaps all the district school-teachers in my district do not receive wages as large as that; but you know, you that have investigated the educational problem within recent years—you know that all over the country, especially in some portions of New England, people are as rapidly as possible giving up the district schools with their poorly paid teachers—poorly paid because the taxpayers of the little school districts can not afford to pay higher wages—and replacing them by larger, better schools, grade schools, having better courses of instruction and better paid teachers—better paid because the money to pay them comes from the taxpayers of new districts, each made by combining a number of smaller ones. And they are buying automobiles and carrying the children over these enlarged districts to these fine grade schools which have taken the place of the little district schools of which the gentleman from New York was thinking when he propounded the question.

I do not know how many $500 teachers there are in Brooklyn, but there ought not to be any.

To show that my estimate of the importance of the business of the teacher in this country is not too high, I call attention to what was said on this subject years ago by William Ellery Channing:

> The dignity of the vocation of a teacher is beginning to be understood; the idea is dawning on us that no office can compare in solemnity and importance with that of training the child; that skill to form the young to energy, truth, and virtue is worth more than the knowledge of all other arts and sciences; and that, of consequence, the encouragement of excellent teachers is the first duty which a community owes to itself. I say the truth is dawning and must make its way. * * * The whole worth of a school lies in the teacher. You may accumulate the most expensive apparatus for instruction, but without an intellectual, gifted teacher it is little better than rubbish; and such a teacher without apparatus may effect the happiest results.
> What we want is a race of teachers acquainted with the philosophy of the mind, gifted men and women, who shall respect human nature in the child and strive to touch and gently bring out its best powers and sympathies, and who shall devote themselves to this as the great end of life. This good, I trust, is to come, but it comes slowly. * * * This good requires that education shall be recognized by the community as its highest interest and duty. It requires—

And I ask the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] particularly to these words of this great man—

> It requires that the instructors of youth shall take precedence of the money-getting class, and that the woman of fashion shall fall behind the female teacher.

Those are strong words and true.

Mr. Chairman, we should measure the importance of the vocation of a teacher in our public schools not by the amount of wages which little school districts in some of the rural portions of the country are able to pay, but solely by the nature of the calling; by the fact that teachers take children when they are in the impressionable, habit-forming age. And nothing is truer than the saying that "habit is a cable. We weave a strand a day and at last it becomes so strong that we can not break it."

Teaching school is a noble profession. Teachers ought to be persons of high character, of education, of intelligence, of soul, who realize the nature of their exalted calling; and to require those competent to do work of such transcendent importance to us as a Nation to receive wages that afford only a bare livelihood is to me indefensible. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved, and the Chair supposes that that will have to be disposed of first. It was reserved by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I shall reserve the point of order against this item. I do not desire to make the point of order as against the employees in the District of Columbia, except those excluded by the provisions of the amendment—the police, the firemen, and the teachers—but if an effort is to be made to load this bill down with increases for these teachers, who are the best paid teachers in the United States to the square inch, according to their ability, and with increases for the firemen and the policemen, who have been recently cared for—one in the current bill and one class last year—I expect to make the point of order. I want to say that to force me to do it will be doing an injustice to the employees of the District of Columbia, whom we seek to help and put on an equal footing with anyone else, and I presume if I do not make the point of order the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] will.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to become the custodian of the conscience of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] or of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I will say that so far as I am concerned I have no desire to have the gentleman become the custodian of my conscience. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. When we had the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill under consideration in the House the other day there was an understanding, at least some of us thought there was, that an amendment would be offered to each appropriation bill carrying out the verdict of the House concerning an increase in the salaries of certain Federal employees during the coming fiscal year. When that bill was under consideration a rule was brought into the House to make the amendment providing for a 10 and 5 per cent increase in order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. KEATING. In a moment. While the matter was under consideration the membership of this House adopted amendments which extended the increase to certain of the employees of the Senate and the House, striking out certain limitations in the amendment. Now, the amendment I am about to suggest merely strikes out one of the limitations in this amendment and gives the teachers of the District the benefit of the proposed increase. I submit that it is not exactly fair to the House to have a committee come into the House and submit as important an amendment as this, reserving a point of order upon it, and practically saying to the membership of this House, "You shall accept what we offer without dotting an 'i' or crossing a 't' or we will make a point of order and you will get nothing."

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. On my own personal responsibility as a member of this committee I offered the amendment, and the gentleman is trying now to make me responsible for the action of every other man on the committee. I am not and I refuse to be.

Mr. KEATING. The membership of this House understands the situation exactly. The various appropriation committees were practically instructed by this House to bring in this amendment, and I take it that the membership of this House did not instruct the committees to attach a proviso which would prevent the membership of the House from offering amendments. I have no desire to load down the amendment. I might offer an amendment, as I did the other day, increasing the rates. I have no desire to do that, but I think it is entirely proper to give this House an opportunity to say whether the teachers and the firemen and the policemen shall be included in this raise.

The statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] that the teachers of this District are better paid than the teachers anywhere else in the country can not be sustained by an examination of the facts. If given the opportunity here of discussing the matter, we will present all kinds of testimony to show they are not the best paid teachers in the country, that they are not even paid the standard wages. So, Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon offering my amendment, and if the gentleman from Georgia desires to make the point of order now is the time to make it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that the man who attempts to protect the Treasury of the United States against the greatest salary grab ever inaugurated in the history of this country at the present time is not making himself particularly popular. But I came here under the impression, and under the implied pledge to my constituents, that I would at least attempt to protect the Treasury of the United States. I am aware of the difficulty that Members of this House labor under to-day. On Tuesday of this week they increased their own allowances for clerical hire, and that inaugurated an assault on the Treasury by 500,000 Government employees, which we seem now powerless to prevent. Under the leadership of a Republican Member of this Congress, following Republican banners, day before yesterday an assault on the Treasury proceeded. Under his leadership the battle was won, and the lid was taken off the Treasury. We commenced to help ourselves, and we seem powerless now, if we continue that operation, to deny the demands of 500,000 people in this country who are on the Government pay rolls. In France they celebrate every year the fall of the Bastille. In the future those who have designs upon the Treasury can well celebrate in the history of this country Tuesday of this week when the Treasury fell.

On that day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER], now serving his first term in this House, assumed the leadership of the Republican Party and, grabbing the Republican standard, violently and enthusiastically led his assault upon the Treasury of the United States. One hundred and fourteen Republican Members of this House followed him gallantly and, I am sorry to say, 69 Democrats trailed along behind. By a majority of 17 votes the proposition carried, and there was added $500 per year to the clerical allowance now fixed by law for each Member of Congress, an increase of 33 per cent, a larger increase than these Government employees are demanding; but that Republican victory leaves those who voted for the proposition in a position where it is exceedingly difficult for them to refuse all these other demands made by half a million Government employees.

We are told by the papers this morning that last night in this Capital city 2,000 Government employees assembled and applauded speeches made by Members of this House, who announced to them that the 5 and 10 per cent blanket increase in their salary allowed in the legislative bill, without regard to merit, without regard to how much they would receive if they were in private employment, was too little, and they advised them to continue the assault on the Treasury until they secured a 10 and 20 per cent increase in their salaries, and this great meeting unanimously and with tremendous enthusiasm adopted resolutions to that effect. They are no more satisfied with this increase you gave them in that bill than if you had not given them anything. They announce their intention to carrry the fight on to the Senate of the United States in order to make this an increase of 10 and 20 per cent.

THE ARGUMENT FOR THE PROPOSED INCREASES.

Gentlemen say these salaries ought to be raised because they have not been raised for half a century and because the cost of living is greater now than it has been heretofore. When those salaries were fixed they were fixed under the old spoils system, when we did not have the merit system in this country, when we did not have civil-service examinations and requirements, when Government employees were fewer than they are now, when they were appointed because they had rendered political services. They came here and demanded salaries commensurate with the political services they had rendered and could render their parties. They received salaries far in excess of what they could have received at that time in similar employment in private life. Members of this House, if they were at the head of any of these great organizations which pay out immense sums in salaries and immense sums in wages each year, before they consented to raise wages would examine into the question as to how much these men were earning and how much they were entitled to receive. No such matters are being considered in connection with these proposed increases.

I know that this assault on the Treasury, the greatest in the history of the Nation, comes at a most propitious time, when this country is prosperous, when people have money, when they are not protesting as vigorously as they would in 1907, when nobody had any money; but we are bracing ourselves now for the shock which will come when this world war ends. Even the peace message of the President of the United States to the allied powers, which every man in this House approves, brought about a fall in stocks on the New York market. We can not settle the question of the high cost of living by raising salaries; we can not settle it by placing an embargo upon foodstuffs; we can not settle such broad questions of statesmanship in that way.

THE KEATING AMENDMENT.

How much would the amendment to the legislative bill offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], who has just taken his seat, cost the country? When this matter was up before on his amendment to the legislative bill to increase this allowance from 5 and 10 to 10 and 20 per cent, I said to him as he took his seat, "How much will it cost the Government to do that." He did not know. He said in his speech, in effect, "This was agreed upon by a committee representing Government employees here, and they have authorized me to come here and present it." That is how this idea of the 20 per cent increase originated. The gentleman did not know how much it would cost, but he told me it would cost just twice as much as the proposition which the committee offered would cost. If it does cost twice as much as that proposition, it would cost $60,000,000.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Just for a question. I just want to set myself right.

Mr. RAINEY. I will be glad for the gentleman to do so.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman did ask how much it would cost. I told him what I told others, approximately $40,000,000. The chairman and others repeatedly said they could not form an estimate of what the cost of their amendment would be, but they finally got such an estimate. It was not $30,000,000, as the gentleman suggests, but it was something over $25,000,000.

I think it was something over $25,000,000. To double that would be something like $51,000,000. So the gentleman is only $9,000,000 off with his figures.

Mr. RAINEY. Whether I am or not——

Mr. KEATING. A little matter of $9,000,000 will not make any difference with you, but you should be right.

Mr. RAINEY. I know it will not make any difference with you.

Mr. KEATING. It does, apparently with you.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know what the gentleman said to others, but he made the statement to me, as I have stated it here; and whether it is $25,000,000 or whether it is $30,000,000, or whether his amendment means $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, does not interfere in the least with the force of the objections I am now making to this proposed salary grab which is to go into all the supply bills, and in which 500,000 people are to participate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman, as I understood it, said the increase in compensation would not solve the problem that is confronting the people as to the high cost of living. Can the gentleman suggest what will solve it? If he will permit me, I have heard the gentleman make speeches and have read them in the press in regard to curbing the trusts and monopolies——

Mr. RAINEY. My colleague will excuse me for not yielding for a speech. I could not answer my colleague's pertinent question in the time I am permitted to occupy now. In fact, I do not know whether I could answer it at all or not. But I know this is not the way to do it.

Now, during the progress of the legislative bill the so-called minimum wage bill was introduced as an amendment, offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN]. I wonder if he knows what that would cost, in addition to the proposition for these Government employees contained in these bills, if it should also be adopted hereafter?

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. For a question.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman did not ask me if I knew, did he?

Mr. RAINEY. I did not, because I have investigated for myself, and I will tell the House pretty soon what it will cost, and then the gentleman can make his own statement, if he cares to do so. I know what it will cost. And the intention is to add it, they say, to whatever increase they get here—5 or 10 or 20 per cent, or whatever the case may be. I employed an expert statistician to figure out the Nolan-bill increase, and he advises me that that minimum-wage bill means another increase of $20,000,000 every year.

SALARIES OUGHT TO BE REVISED.

Now, I know that salaries of Government clerks and employees ought to be revised. I am in favor of doing that. I have never objected on this floor, and I never intend to do so, to a reasonable increase suggested in the salary of any Government employee by the committee after the increase had been recommended by the head of the department and the committee had considered it. But here is a blanket increase which we are told is now to be extended down through all these bills without regard to merit. I know scores of Government employees who are underpaid, who ought to receive more money than they now get for the service they render to this great Government, and I know of scores who are overpaid and who do not earn the compensation they now receive.

Only last week out in the city of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], for whose opinions I entertain the highest respect, a great auditorium was filled with men who were 45 years old and over and who could not get employment. The railroads of this country, the great industrial institutions of this country, are discharging men because they have reached the age of 45 years. We do not discharge them and ought not to do so. These Government positions are desirable ones. We give them vacations on public holidays, sick leave, 30-day vacations, all with full pay, and we keep them here even when far advanced in years. They receive their pay, a fixed sum every month, from a paymaster who is still solvent. If they have their way about it, I do not know how long this solvency will continue.

A great church organization has in its ritual a prayer for the "President of the United States and all others in authority," and they are talking about changing that particular clause. If they do change it, the change they ought to make is to strike out "all others in authority." The history of the House in the last two or three days indicates that those in authority do not need any help of that kind. They can help themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to insist upon my point of order, I want to assure the gentlemen who are asking me to withdraw it. This proposed increase is contrary to existing law, and as long as we have a rule which the Rules Committee of this House has not repealed with the consent of the House, I propose to insist on this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That all laws and parts of laws to the extent that they are inconsistent with this act are repealed.

Mr. BENNET and Mr. PAGE of North Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. BENNET. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman from New York makes a point on that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19119), making appropriations to provide for the expense of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes, perhaps longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are in the House, having finished the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill in committee. I think it is a duty that I owe to the House—and a very pleasant duty—to make a reference to the gentleman who has had charge of the District appropriation bill in the House. I do not recall how long Mr. PAGE has been a Member of the House of Representatives, nor even how long he has had charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, but I do recall that for many years in this House it has been a sincere pleasure to me personally, and I am sure to all the other Members of the House, to meet with the pleasing personality of the gentleman from North Carolina. [Applause.]

I make it a practice, and have done so for many years, of privately receiving advice, suggestions, and information from Members on the Democratic side, though I do not always give them credit in public. [Laughter.] I have frequently had the honor and the pleasure of seeking the advice of the gentleman from North Carolina. The House has learned to rely very largely upon his judgment, and to have the highest regard for his opinion. [Applause.]

We come and go, treating those who are here and dealing with those who are here on terms of equality. No matter how much we may love a Member who goes out, we treat his successor as one of us, on the same plane with all. But to me the one thing that causes me distress as a Member of this House is parting with those Members whom I have learned to love.

The gentleman from North Carolina goes out of the House purely on his own volition. He goes with the respect and the admiration of every Member of this body, and with the sincere regret of us all that he will not be in the next House to give us the benefit and comfort of his courage, indomitable as it is [applause], of his wise opinions, and of his pleasing manner of dealing with all who come into contact with him. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, every one who is acquainted with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] not only shares the high opinion entertained of him by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but must be under a deep sense of obligation for the generous manner in which he has expressed it.

Six years ago, when first appointed to the head of the Committee on Appropriations, I was in the somewhat unusual position of being placed over a committee with 14 members of the majority party, only 3 of whom had ever served on that committee. It necessitated careful and patient work to organize the committee properly, and to have the members unfamiliar with its work become acquainted with the many multiplied duties of its members and to enable them to accumulate the information necessary to discharge their duties in a manner satisfactory to the House and to the country. The gentleman from North Carolina had not served upon the committee prior to that time, but with an industry that was unrivalled, with great patience and tact, he not only became thoroughly familiar with the work of the committee, but he also did that much more important thing—he very speedily gained the confidence of the House for his wide knowledge and for the accuracy and the reliability of his statements.

Mr. Speaker, my experience in the House, now extending over a period of 18 years, leads me to believe that more important than brilliant attainments or great talents is that sincerity of purpose and honesty of statement that make Members of this House have absolute faith in the Member addressing them. [Applause.] Once that confidence is gained, it is invaluable, and I have never in my experience known of a Member to do anything or to act in any way to justify the House in withdrawing its confidence. The gentleman from North Carolina has so mastered the details of his work, has so won the confidence of the House, and has exercised such sound judgment in the discharge of his public duties that he has not only relieved me of a very considerable portion of the burdens and duties of my position, but he has made the District of Columbia appropriation bill one that now has the approval not only of the House, but of the community.

The most surprising thing I have known in many years has been the universal approval of the press of this city of the District bill as reported and just completed in the committee. The bill was so framed that it aroused but slight antagonism. With the exception of some matters of legislative concern, which the experience and wisdom of the committee led them to believe were desirable to submit to the House, but which Members could properly eliminate by the exercise of their right under the rules, the bill received practically universal commendation in the House. I can only hope that in the future these bills will be received with the same favor, not only here, but on the outside. The gentleman from North Carolina has had an intelligent interest in the development and beautifying of the National Capital. He has not been anxious to rush hastily and speedily to the completion of many things that, although desirable, can not be done too rapidly, but with an intelligent and comprehensive knowledge of the needs of the District of Columbia and the necessities of its government he has so framed the appropriation bills as to give satisfaction to all concerned.

I regret exceedingly that he determined to retire to private life. He has been a loyal supporter in many difficult hours; he has been a safe counselor in troublesome matters; he has been a confidant who consoled; he has been a generous and devoted friend. He has had a successful and brilliant career in the House, and I know I express the hope of all Members that the years after his retirement will be long, happy, and prosperous. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to express my feelings upon this occasion. I can not trust myself. I can only thank my friends, the leader of the minority, Mr. MANN, the chairman of my committee, Mr. FITZGERALD, and the membership of this House for their very liberal estimate of my service here.

I want to say to my colleagues that I have felt until just now that I should be very happy when I retired to private life, and I hope I shall be; but I can not forget, nor shall I undertake to forget, that I separate with my colleagues here with very great reluctance, because it means a separation from those whom I have learned to love very dearly. I thank you, my colleagues, for this tribute. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is there any gentleman in the House opposed to it who wishes to make a motion to recommit? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri. The Clerk will report his motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BORLAND moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment, on page 98, line 14:

"No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any department appropriated for herein which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BORLAND. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 82.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is an automatic call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 169, answered "present" 2, not voting 195, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE DELAWARE RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The bill (S. 7095) extending the time for the completion of a bridge across the Delaware River the Speaker signed the other day. The copy signed was rather greasy looking but perfectly legible. It went to the Senate, and some clerk there cut the bill up instead of giving it to the Vice President to sign. So, the Speaker had the enrolling Clerk make a new copy, and the Speaker asks the consent of the House to erase his name from the first bill, and that the Journal record made on the first bill when he laid it before the House stand, and the one just signed take its place. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 19300) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Rept. 1245) which was read a first and second time and, with accompanying papers, ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order.

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY (H. DOC. NO. 1793).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying documents, ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by the acts of Congress approved March 4, 1915, and February 28, 1916, I transmit herewith the report of the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the period from March 25, 1913, to October 31, 1916.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 21, 1916.

THE HOUSE BELLS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, two hours ago, when the point of no quorum was made, some one rang the wrong number of bells. The bell rang four times, and I understood that the House had adjourned and did not come over. I was in my office and could have answered "present" if the bells had been rung correctly. I ask to have my name enrolled as "present."

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be excused from attendance this afternoon.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I did not ask that. I want to say to the Speaker and the Members of this House that I had been to one of the departments and had just returned. The wrong signal was given or I would have reported here and answered to my name.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman want?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I want to be recorded as "present" on that call of the House.

Mr. MANN. That can not be done.

DIVERSION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 326, authorizing the Secretary of War to issue a temporary permit for additional diversions of water from Niagara River. It has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 326, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 326.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue permits revocable at will for the diversion of water in the United States from the Niagara River above the Falls for the creation of power, to individuals, companies, or corporations which are now actually producing power from the waters of said river, in additional quantities, which, with present diversions, shall in no case exceed the capacity of the generating machinery of the permittee and tenant companies now installed and ready for operation, nor an amount sufficient to enable the permittee to supply the now existing hydroelectric demands of the individuals, companies, or corporations which said permittee and tenant companies is now supplying, but not in excess of the capacity of power-using appliances of said consumers now installed and ready for operation: Provided, That in no event shall the total quantity of water diverted from said river above the Falls for power purposes exceed in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second: And provided further, That this resolution shall remain in force until the 1st day of July, 1917, and no longer, at the expiration of which time all permits granted hereunder shall terminate, unless sooner revoked; and nothing herein contained shall be held to confirm, establish, or confer in or upon any such permittee any right in or to the water which he is now diverting or which he may be authorized to divert hereunder.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 14, strike out the word "is" and insert the word "are"; page 2, line 4, after the word "diverted," insert the words "in the United States"; page 2, line 8, strike out the word "first" and insert the word "four," and strike out the word "July" in the same line and insert the word "March."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MANN. Is this the Senate or the House resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. This is the House resolution.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, why does the gentleman desire to consider the House resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. The Senate resolution as passed is different from the House resolution as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. If we carried out the views as expressed and voted in the committee, we would have to amend the Senate resolution, and it would have to go back to the Senate, and I therefore thought it as well to take up the House resolution. They are identical, with the exception of the amendments which the Clerk has read.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is quite the courteous thing to do as between the two legislative bodies where the same resolution is introduced in both bodies and one of them passes it first and sends it over, to deliberately ignore the resolution of the other body and consider the resolution of this body. I am afraid that they would look at it in that way over there.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not look at it in that way. Both resolutions were introduced the same day, and the House resolution was reported to this body before the Senate resolution was sent over here.

Mr. MANN. I would if I were over there.

Mr. AUSTIN. What objection can there be to substituting the Senate resolution for the House resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. None whatever.

Mr. MANN. It is as easy to amend the Senate resolution as it is the House resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. This is the resolution which was reported by the House committee. It is reported with three amendments, and differs in that respect from the Senate resolution.

Mr. MANN. The resolution as introduced was the same as the Senate resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; except the title.

Mr. MANN. It is as easy to amend the Senate resolution as it is the House resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; but I do not see why this resolution is not just as much entitled to consideration as the Senate resolution. We look at it only with reference to getting the resolution through. If anyone objects to the resolution and would not object to the Senate resolution, then we will take up the Senate resolution.

Mr. MANN. No one has had a chance to see it, and I think it ought to go over until the morning in any event.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FLOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 186, which is substantially the same resolution as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I ask for its consideration at this time.

Mr. MANN. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no House resolution on the House Calendar as yet.

Mr. FLOOD. It has been reported by the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is true; but the rule provides that it has to be on the House Calendar, and it has to be on the printed calendar.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us take the matter up in the morning.

Mr. FLOOD. We desire to take up the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill in the morning.

Mr. MANN. I do not think this will take very long.

Mr. FLOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman expect to call up the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill in the morning?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If that should be disposed of at an early hour, would it be the expectation of that side to then proceed with the vocational education bill and see if we can make some progress upon that?

Mr. FLOOD. That is my understanding, and I will ask unanimous consent to take up the Niagara Falls resolution in the morning.

Mr. MANN. I should have no objection to that.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 22, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by the age-long tradition of our personal and national life we are brought once more to contemplate the supreme gift of heaven to man, the advent of the Prince of Peace. By the cherished memories of childhood, by the blessed associations of Christian friendship, by the holy ministries of our religion, by the sacred principles of our National Government, Thou dost call upon us to contemplate again the meaning and message of the Babe of Bethlehem. We turn away sick at heart from the carnage of the world in men's bitter strife and hate. Grant that we may with all people hear once more the ancient prophecy saying, "A little child shall lead them." May we hear again in all the earth the echo of the angels' mystic song, "Peace and good will toward men." Grant, we pray, that the year which we face, 1917, may usher in the universal reign of the Prince of Peace. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 407) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 19119) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 6116. An act providing for the taxation of the lands of the Winnebago Indians and the Omaha Indians, in the State of Nebraska;

S. 7095. An act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved the 24th day of August, 1912;

H. R. 407. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 19178. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Berkshire Senatorial Suffrage Committee, of Lee, Mass., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the price of coal, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are next in order. [A pause.] The introduction of bills is next in order.

PEACE OVERTURE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I submit a resolution, and I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 298), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I offered yesterday a similar resolution and, under objection, consented that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I feel, however, that it will require so much time to have a meeting of that committee for the consideration of the resolution that I have offered a similar resolution. I should like to have consideration of it to-day——

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it may go over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But if objection is made I realize that it must go over and be the business of the Senate on the first day of the session after the holiday recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and under the rule the resolution will go over.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Nelson	Sterling
Bankhead	Gallinger	Newlands	Stone
Borah	Gronna	Norris	Sutherland
Brady	Harding	Overman	Swanson
Brandegee	Hardwick	Owen	Thomas
Bryan	Hitchcock	Pittman	Thompson
Chamberlain	Hughes	Poindexter	Townsend
Chilton	Jones	Reed	Vardaman
Clapp	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Walsh
Clark	Kern	Sheppard	Watson
Culberson	Lane	Sherman	Weeks
Cummins	Lee, Md	Shields	Williams
Curtis	McCumber	Smith, Ga.	Works
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN], who was called from the city. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] owing to illness.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona], who is absent on account of serious illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

COTTON FUTURES (S. DOC. NO. 648).

Mr. CHILTON. I ask out of order to submit a report from the Committee on Printing. I am directed by that committee to report back favorably Senate resolution 295, to print the hearings before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry entitled "Cotton futures amendment" as a Senate document; and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the document is not already in print.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not think it is.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was printed by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. All I want to know is in what shape it is. Why not simply ask that so many additional copies of it be printed and then it will be in the same form in which it is already printed.

Mr. CHILTON. The resolution is in the shape in which it has been agreed to by the committee and I can not change it without taking it back to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think that is necessary. All the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] wanted was extra copies, and that is what the committee decided to print.

Mr. CHILTON. Then what is wrong with this resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the resolution there will have to be another print and it will have to have a number and go through that form. It has already been printed at the Government Printing Office and is in print to-day. By a reprint of it the committee can have control of the number, and copies will not have to be sent to the libraries of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not do that anyhow. This document is a hearing had before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and copies are called for. The committee print has been entirely exhausted. There is quite a demand for it all over the country among those interested in this subject. The resolution allows the number of copies to the amount of $500, which is the limit that the Senate can order, and it automatically takes a number, whether we specify it or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily. If a reprint is ordered it will not be a public document, it will be the hearings as originally printed, and that, I understand, is what the Senator wants.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know, but——

Mr. SMOOT. There is no objection to that, but why take the hearings and make a public document of them? Why not have a reprint of the hearings as they are and distribute them in that way?

Mr. FLETCHER. The law is when the Senate orders a reprint of that sort it is a Senate document, and it takes a number.

Mr. OWEN. It can be done upon a resolution of the Committee on Agriculture itself.

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee printed 1,000 copies and they have been exhausted. It is now sought to be made a Senate document. I think it is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the hearings before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on the agricultural appropriation bill for 1917, entitled "Cotton-futures amendment," be printed as a Senate document, and that 10,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SAFETY AT SEA.

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 299):

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on July 25, 1916, entitled "Safety at sea—proposed coastwise pilot charts, showing safety zones and danger places," by Capt. Armistead Rust, United States Navy, be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. CHILTON. The Committee on the Judiciary had before it various resolutions on the subject of national prohibition. There was a hearing before that committee and one of the resolutions was acted upon, and I now report that joint resolution favorably with certain amendments. I ask that it be read and go to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as amended by the committee, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment of the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The sale, manufacture, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes are hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

FLOOD CONTROL.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On behalf of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who is confined to his bed by illness, I report back favorably and without amendment, from the Committee on Commerce, the bill (H. R. 14777) to provide for the control of floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Cal., and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 891) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, with reference to the report just made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], I desire to say that it is not a unanimous report from the committee. Certain members of the committee have reserved the right to file a minority report, if they desire to do so. I understood that would be stated when the report was made; but as it will now appear in the RECORD, the report seems to be a favorable report from the entire committee. I simply desire to make that statement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The majority of the committee have instructed me to report the bill favorably. I will state, however, that there was an understanding that, if certain members of the committee desired to file a minority report, they could do so.

Mr. KENYON. I merely desired that fact to appear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that will be permitted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

R. 19119), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

BATTLE MONUMENT IN THOROLD, CANADA.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 29), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the appreciation of the Government and the people of the United States is hereby expressed of the action taken by the people of Thorold, Ontario, Canada, in erecting a monument near that place to commemorate the death on the battle field of Beaverdams, or Beachwood, of a number of soldiers in the service of the United States who there lost their lives during the War of 1812.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute which I offer to the Sheppard bill (S. 1082), and which has been amended, may be reprinted as amended, so that the Senate can have the opportunity of having the document in amended form to examine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want the substitute reprinted as perfected by the Senate amendments.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama whether this print will contain the original Sheppard bill as amended?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; it will contain everything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19119. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to disposed of House joint resolution 306, relative to certain lands in Oklahoma, which was brought up the other afternoon, and which I think would have been passed if the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs had been at that time read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 306) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the deferred installments due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask to have the joint resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend the time for payment of the final installment due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt land area belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, sold under the act of Congress approved February 19, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 67), to four years after the sale was made instead of two years, as provided in section 5 of the said act: Provided, That the accrued interest on all installments to date when due and the principal of the second installment, if due, shall be paid before an extension as herein provided may be granted: And provided further, That in all other respects the provisions of existing law shall apply to these purchases.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, is there a report accompanying this joint resolution?

Mr. OWEN. There is a report upon it by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLARK. I mean, is there a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs on the joint resolution?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and the report of the Secretary of the Interior, to which I referred, is embodied in the report of the committee.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, the report need not further be read. The report which I hold in my hand is a report upon the House joint resolution, which is, as I understand, identical with the Senate joint resolution on the same subject.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I should be glad, however, to have the report printed in full in the RECORD in connection with the joint resolution.

Mr. OWEN. I should also be glad to have the report printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that will be done.

The report referred to is as follows:

DEFERRED INSTALLMENTS ON COAL AND ASPHALT LANDS.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 306) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of the deferred installments due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma, having carefully considered the same, reports the resolution back without amendment and recommends that the same be enacted into law.

The act of February 19, 1912, providing for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians, contains the following provision:

"SEC. 5. That the sales herein provided for shall be at public auction under rules and regulations and upon terms to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, except that no payment shall be deferred longer than two years after the sale is made. All agricultural lands shall be sold in tracts not to exceed 160 acres, and deeds shall not be issued to any one person for more than 160 acres of agricultural land, grazing lands in tracts not to exceed 640 acres, and lands especially valuable by reason of proximity to towns or cities may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be sold in lots or tracts containing not less than 1 acre each. All deferred payments shall bear interest at 5 per cent per annum, and if default be made in any payment when due all rights of the purchaser thereunder shall, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, cease and the lands shall be taken possession of by him for the benefit of the two nations, and the money paid as the purchase price of such lands shall be forfeited to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians."

Pending congressional action on this resolution, the Secretary of the Interior has declared no forfeitures. The following letter of the Secretary explains the purpose of the resolution, as well as shows the favorable attitude of the department toward the relief sought:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 14, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. STEPHENS: I am in receipt of your letter of December 9, 1916, transmitting therewith a printed copy of H. J. Res. 306, introduced in the House of Representatives on December 4, 1916, by Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma and entitled:

"Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of the deferred installments due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma."

H. J. Res. 306 is identical in language with S. J. Res. 178, introduced in the Senate on December 5, 1916, by Mr. OWEN, of Oklahoma.

I am in favor of the joint resolution being enacted into law.

Section 5 of the act of Congress of February 19, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 67–69), pursuant to which the sales of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt land area, Choctaw Nation, Okla., were made, expressly provided that "no payment shall be deferred longer than two years after the sale is made."

This resolution proposes to extend the time four years after the sale was made, instead of two years as above provided, which will extend the time for payment two years longer than under existing law.

The first sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt land classified as agricultural and grazing land was held from November 16 to December 2, 1914, and the first sale of such portion of the surface as was classified as suitable for town-site purposes was held from January 5 to 31, 1916.

Upon petition of purchasers and recommendations of the chief executives of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, the department on September 30, 1915, extended the time for all deferred payments on the unallotted land, timberland, and surface of the segregated coal and asphalt land, Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, due November and December, 1915, and January and February, 1916, one year on payment of interest on balance of unpaid purchase price, said extension to become effective only upon payment of interest.

To the surprise of many purchasers this extension had the effect of making the second installment due on the purchase price of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt land area fall due at the same time that the third and last installment fell due, thus adding a double burden where the second and third installments fell due in November and December, 1916, and January and February, 1917.

It is now proposed to defer the payment of the third and last installment due on the purchase price of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt land area, Choctaw Nation, Oklahoma, provided that purchasers pay the full amount of the principal of the second installment, which was extended one year and is now due, together with all accrued interest on both the second and third installments to date when due, before an extension of time will be granted for payment of the last installment.

This extension will not work a hardship on the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, because the deferred payments under the law draw 5 per cent interest per annum from date of sale, which is a larger rate of interest than the majority of the State and National banks of Oklahoma are now paying on time deposits of Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal funds.

The Choctaw Tribe on December 1, 1916, had to its credit an approximate available balance of $3,062,502.18, while on same date the Chickasaw Tribe had to its credit an approximate available balance of $1,042,798.24, making a total of $4,105,300.42 to the credit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, to which is to be added the proceeds of the recent sale of Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal lands held from October 4 to 31, 1916, inclusive, which brought, according to the report of the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes, under date of December 4, 1916, a total sum of $1,782,723.17, and when fully paid in will make available for the needs of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes the total sum of $5,888,023.59.

With these funds in view I do not believe that an extension of two years of the time for payment, as provided in the resolution, will inconvenience the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, and should be granted.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 178) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of the deferred installments due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma be postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be postponed indefinitely.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, is the morning business closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has been concluded.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to take up Senate bill 392, which is known as the Civil War volunteer officers' retired list bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to inquire of the Presiding Officer what the order of business ordinarily would be at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know of any reason why we should not proceed to the consideration of the calendar at sometime.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I gave notice yesterday that I should this morning move that the Senate go into executive session. I have not been disposed to make that motion so long as there were small matters to be brought to the attention of the Senate which could be disposed of by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is not debatable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move, as a substitute for that motion, that the Senate now go into executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator can not properly do that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The motion of the Senator from Nevada takes precedence.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business under Rule XXII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion of the Senator from Nevada takes precedence of the motion of the Senator from Michigan, and is a privileged question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I make a parliamentary inquiry. Upon what are we to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll is being called upon the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. He is not present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent. For that reason I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I beg to announce—and I ask that this announcement stand for the day—that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). The Chair transfers his general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and votes "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS'S name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent unavoidably, being detained at home. He has a pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). I rise to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent from the Senate because of serious illness in his family.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am advised that if my pair, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], were present, he would vote "nay." I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will let my vote stand.

I wish also to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES]. He has, as already announced, a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. OWEN. I should like to inquire if the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. OWEN. Then I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the affirmative). By inadvertence I voted. I learn that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a pair, has not voted. I now transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], with whom I have a pair is not present. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and will let my vote stand.

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has not voted. I transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. GRONNA. I have voted in the negative, but I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I understand he is not in the Chamber, and I will have to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 29, as follows:

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now insist upon the motion I have made that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will state it.

Mr. CHILTON. Is it not true that at 2 o'clock Senate bill 392, to which the Senator from Michigan refers, will come up automatically?

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion made by the Senator from Michigan is not debatable.

Mr. CHILTON. I can ask a parliamentary question, can I not?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to a debate on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia rose to a parliamentary inquiry and asked whether the bill named by the Senator from Michigan was not the unfinished business. The Chair will say that it is. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I understand that if my pair, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], were present, he would vote "yea." I therefore feel that I am released. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer that I made upon the former ballot and vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP. Making the same announcement that I made a few moments ago with reference to the transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the former roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], who is absent from the Chamber, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay." In this connection I desire to say that I voted on the last roll call without announcing the transfer. I did so inadvertently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when the name of Mr. SAULSBURY was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I made a short while ago, I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Having a pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the preceding vote and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement that I made upon the last ballot as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

During the reading,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has this bill never been read before?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been read at this session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was the reading demanded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been demanded. The Secretary proceeded with the reading on taking up the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection; but if it has been read I did not know but that we would save some time by dispensing with the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been read at this Congress, the Chair is informed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, which in full is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in recognition of meritorious service rendered to the Government of the United States in the Civil War for the preservation of the Union, there is hereby created in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list." Upon written application made to the Secretary of the proper department, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, the name of each surviving officer of Volunteers who served as an officer in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War and was honorably discharged from service by muster out, resignation, or otherwise, shall be entered on said list as of the highest rank held by him during said service. Each surviving officer so entered on said list shall have served in said Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in said war not less than six months, shall not have been retired with continuing retired pay, and shall not belong to the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps: Provided, That a surviving officer who lost an eye, an arm, or a leg in the line of duty, or who was honorably discharged from service for disability because of a wound or other bodily injury received or incurred in the line of duty, or because of disability incurred in the line of duty while a prisoner of war, shall, if otherwise eligible under the terms hereof, be entitled to be placed on said list and to receive the maximum retired pay herein provided for officers of his former rank, without regard to the length of his said service: Provided further, That in computing the length of service of any surviving officer for the purposes of this act there shall be included, in addition to his service as an officer of any rank, all such service as he shall have rendered in said war as an enlisted man or as an appointed petty officer. Applications for entry on said Civil War volunteer officers' retired list shall be made in such form and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, and proper blanks shall be furnished for said purpose upon request made to the proper department by surviving officers claiming the benefits of this act. A certificate of service, and of enrollment under this act, properly prepared in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, shall be furnished to each surviving officer whose name shall be entered on said list.

Surviving officers who served as officers in the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who were honorably discharged from service for disability, and have not been reinstated in said service nor retired with continuing retired pay, shall, upon application duly made, be entered on said list and receive the same retired pay and other benefits, according to former rank and service, that are herein provided for surviving volunteer officers.

Subject to the maximum limitation of retired pay hereinafter contained, each surviving officer whose name shall have been duly entered on said list, who shall have served as aforesaid in the Civil War a term or terms aggregating two years or more, shall receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, retired pay according to his former highest rank and former branch of service as entered on said list, which retired pay shall be equal to one-half of the initial active pay now received by officers of like or equivalent rank in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, respectively; and each surviving officer whose name shall have been duly entered on said list who shall have served as aforesaid in the Civil War a term or terms aggregating less than two years, but not less than six months, shall receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, retired pay, each according to his former rank and aggregate term of service, the amount thereof bearing such proportion to the retired pay herein granted to officers of the same rank for two years' service as the aggregate term of service bears to said term of two years. The retired pay provided for by this act shall begin upon the date of the passage of this act and continue during the natural life of the beneficiary; it shall be payable quarterly, and shall not exceed, in the case of any surviving officer, three-fourths of the initial active pay now received by a captain in the United States Army.

Each surviving officer who shall receive retired pay under this act shall thereby relinquish all his right and claim to pension from the United States after the date of the passage of this act, and any payment of such pension made to him covering a period subsequent to the passage of this act shall be deducted from the amount due him on the first payment or payments under this act. The retired pay allowed under this act shall not be subject or liable to any attachment, levy, lien, or detention under any process whatsoever; and persons whose names are placed upon said list shall not constitute any part of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, is there a report accompanying this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee reports two amendments.

Mr. STONE. Is there a printed report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a printed report.

Mr. STONE. I think it ought to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report (No. 307) submitted by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN March 27, 1916, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon, with retired pay, certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes, reports the same to the Senate with amendments, and as thus amended the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The amendments proposed by your committee are as follows:

On line 13, page 2, after the word "service" strike out the words "for disability" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "By muster out, resignation, or otherwise."

On line 14, page 3, after the word "service" strike out the words "for disability" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "By muster out, resignation, or otherwise."

The following statements of facts are confidently presented to the Senate as conclusive reasons to justify the passage of this bill:

[Act of May 25, 1861. Act of July 22, 1861. Approved July 22, 1861.]

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the Regular Army.

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the Regular service. * * *" (Approved July 22, 1861.)

July 22, 1861, act places Volunteers and Regulars, as to pay and allowances, in all respects on equal footing. On those and other Government promises the Union forces were enlisted and mustered, served the cause, and were retired by discharge for wounds or disability or close of term of service or end of war, 1866, and that promised equality should now be fulfilled in whole or part as called for in S. 392 and H. R. 386, referred to.

SOME FACTS PERTINENT TO THESE CLAIMS.

1. The full retired pay granted for life to all survivors of the Revolutionary, 1812, and Indian Wars, in accordance with rank. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 4, pp. 269, 270, 529, 530.)

2. The present extra grade and extra pay granted to all Regulars with Civil War volunteer service regardless of term of such service or its nature.

3. The acts of Congress March 3, 1905, nearly 40 years after the close of the Civil War, giving retirement and retired pay to Gen. Hawley and Gen. Osterhaus as brigadier generals, for Civil War service as volunteers. The granting of more than enlisted men's pay to all such surviving Volunteers by pension act of May 11, 1912.

The legislatures of States representing 50,000,000 of people and all Loyal Legion commanderies have approved the Volunteer retired list measure.

Without commissioned officers to guide, direct, and care for the more than 2,000,000 men of the Army and Navy in 1861 to 1866, the preservation of the Union could not have been accomplished.

The fact that a majority of the Members of both Houses of Congress have on individual canvass approved the measure, with a cost to the Government of less than $4,000,000 first year.

Justice delayed for 50 years calls for this legislation. There are not over 7,000 survivors; average age, 78.

The fact that 95 per cent of the officers of the Union forces were Volunteers, from civil life, and promoted from the ranks, but have received no recognition as officers by any general legislation. That 90 per cent of these preservers of the Nation have died without the honor and benefit to which they were entitled by acts of Congress.

All nations of the world have given especial honors to their warrior officers, always recognizing by pay and distinction—estates, titles, and large money grants—their claim to superior consideration.

THE FUTURE OFFICER MUST BE ASSURED THAT TO HIM THE GOVERNMENT'S PROMISE WILL PROVE TO BE AS GOOD AS GOLD.

Gen. SHERWOOD, of the House of Representatives, well said every country in the world recognizes the difference between the officer and the private. We do that. We retire our Regular Army officers at the age of 64 years. Not 5 per cent of these officers ever saw any battle service. There is never any question raised as to cost. Now, here is a body of men whose average age is about 80 years, every one of whom has seen service, and hard service. The question is, Shall we recognize merit and service?

The Senate is reminded that a bill very similar to this, entitled "A bill for the relief of the surviving officers of the Revolution," was before the Senate and debated on the 25th of April, 1828, which passed and became a law. The immortal Webster, then a Senator from Massachusetts, spoke in favor of that bill:

"This bill is intended for those who, being in the Army in October, 1780, then received a solemn promise of half pay for life, on condition that they would continue to serve through the war. Their ground of merit, in that whensoever they joined the Army, being thus solicited by their country to remain in it, they at once went for the whole war; they fastened their fortunes to the standards which they bore, and resolved to continue their military service until it should terminate either in their country's success or in their own death. This is their merit and the ground of their claim.

"The militia who fought at Concord, Lexington, at Bunker Hill, have been alluded to in the course of this debate in terms of well-deserved praise. Be assured, sir, there could with difficulty be found a man who drew his sword or carried his musket at Concord or Lexington or Bunker Hill who would wish you to reject this bill. They might ask you to do more, but never to refrain from doing this. Would to God they were assembled here and had the fate of the bill in their own hands! Would to God the question of its passage were to be put to them! They would affirm it with a unity of acclamation that would rend the roof of the Capitol.

"The objects, then, sir, of the proposed bounty are most worthy and deserving objects. The services which they rendered were in the highest degree useful and important. The country to which they rendered them is great and prosperous. They have lived to see it glorious; let them not live to see it unkind. For me, I can give them but my vote and my prayers, and I give them both with my whole heart."

These words, coming from the lips of Mr. Webster, ought to impress every Senator that this is no new theory on the part of the Congress to recognize the obligation resting upon Congress to keep the pledges made by its predecessors.

This action on the part of Congress is not one of almsgiving. All nations of the world have given especial honors to their warrior officers, always recognizing by pay and distinguished recognition, or large money grants, their claim to superior consideration.

Senator H. M. Teller, of Colorado, on June 13, 1906, presented a memorial favoring this legislation, as follows:

"In considering the claims of the petitioners to the considerate action of Congress, the value of their services must be judged of by the magnitude and importance of the issues involved in the Civil War and the results accomplished.

"In respect to the interests of the whole race of mankind, the preservation of the Union was the most important political event in the tide of time.

"The victory of the Union Army kept in the political firmament of the world, as a beacon light, the republican principle of self-government.

"Not only the repose, the progress, and the prosperity, but the very existence of the United States as a Nation was involved in the tremendous struggle.

"The people of the United States owe their present marvelous prosperity, their peace at home, and their influence abroad to the fact that the Union was preserved by the patriotism, valor, and fortitude of the Volunteers.

"It is a well-established historical fact that officers of the Volunteers commanding troops in the field performed their duties with equal ability, zeal, and courage, and encountered the same hazards as did officers of similar rank of the Regular Army. Upon an examination of the records of these surviving generals it will be found that they all had long service and that the great majority of them entered the service in 1861 and remained therein until the close of the war in 1865."

In view of all of these facts it seems clear that justice and fair dealing require that in respect to services in said war the rights of Volunteer officers to honors and emoluments should have been equal to those of the Regular Army. This was not done. The appeal of these veteran Volunteer officers is not a call for charity. They simply point to the record and request the Government to render equity to men who believe they have earned, and thus far failed to receive, equity.

The present request for the proposed legislation is based on this fivefold sanction:

(1) The general merits of the case, including the magnitude, results, and value of the service rendered, national expediency, and patriotic gratitude.

(2) The pledges given by Congress and President Lincoln at the opening of the Civil War to the several States and to the Volunteers furnished by them.

(3) The action and policy of the Government since the war in extending to practically all surviving officers of the Regular Army and Navy special rewards exclusively for Civil War service, which, contrary to the pledges referred to, have thus far been withheld from surviving volunteer officers.

(4) The commanding precedent furnished by the United States Government in 1828 and 1832 in granting to the aged surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army full pay, limited to that of a captain, during the remainder of life.

(5) Present public sentiment in the Nation, as shown, among other proofs, by the unanimous action of the legislatures of 13 States, speaking for nearly 50,000,000 of our people, recommending the enactment of such a measure.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the rather long and impressive document just read to the Senate has been listened to by not more than 10 or 12 Senators. That document contains the argument presented by the committee reporting the bill in favor of the passage of the bill, an important measure, important for one reason, because it involves the expenditure of millions of dollars. I do not think this measure should proceed further without the presence of a quorum, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Missouri. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Nelson	Sterling
Bankhead	Gallinger	Newlands	Stone
Beckham	Gore	Norris	Sutherland
Borah	Gronna	Phelan	Thomas
Brady	Harding	Pittman	Thompson
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Townsend

Chilton	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Clapp	Kern	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Clark	Lane	Sherman	Walsh
Cummins	McCumber	Shields	Works
Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has been called out of the city to attend a funeral. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that the names of the absentees may be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. REED answered to his name when called.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. LEE of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire if it be in order at this time to move to take up the calendar, according to the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has taken up, on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, Senate bill 392. It has made an order in that respect, thereby displacing the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. But I have an impression that the Senate could change its mind at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It undoubtedly can by a reconsideration or motion to take up another bill.

Mr. WALSH. If that be the case, I inquire whether it would be in order to move to take up another bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would be.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that motion, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. As I understand, if present he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). The Chair makes the same announcement of the transfer of his pair as heretofore and votes "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). My pair being absent, I withhold my vote, but I ask to be counted for a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He appears to be absent, and so I withhold my vote. I desire, however, to be counted as present for a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). May I inquire whether the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the preceding vote and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. OVERMAN. Announcing my pair and its transfer as previously, I vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I transfer my general pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], but I understand that, if present, he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore feel released and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I desire to know if the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my general pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. KERN. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] on account of official business.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that there was a transfer of pairs made covering me while I was temporarily absent. I desire, however, to be called in order to vote "present."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think that at least three Senators were present who did not vote. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said that he was paired, which indicates that he was present, and there were, I think, two other Senators present and not voting, making three at least who should be counted as present to make a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Minnesota that he noted the presence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. Subsequently the Senator from Alabama voted, leaving only two to be counted, which does not make a quorum.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to be marked "present." I was in the Chamber, but did not hear my name called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The announcement has been made, and the Secretary has been instructed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Owen	Thomas
Beckham	Gore	Phelan	Townsend
Borah	Gronna	Pittman	Underwood
Brandegee	Harding	Poindexter	Vardaman
Bryan	Jones	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Sheppard	Watson
Chilton	Kern	Sherman	Williams
Clapp	McCumber	Shields	Works
Clark	Nelson	Smoot
Cummins	Newlands	Stone
Curtis	Norris	Sutherland

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. POMERENE, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. LANE, and Mr. THOMAS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce again that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of the absent Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms is directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

Mr. DU PONT, Mr. BRADY, and Mr. WEEKS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore and vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I formerly made with reference to the transfer of my pair, and letting that announcement stand for the day, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], but I am informed that upon this question he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made before with respect to a transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the preceding vote, and vote "yea." I inquire whether I am recorded as present on the last quorum call?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the call be completed, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the inquiry can be entertained at the present time.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. Making the same announcement as on previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have already voted. I renew my announcement of the transfer of my pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARDWICK. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. Observing that he is not present, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call resulted—yeas 13, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Bryan	Hughes	Smith, Ga.	Walsh

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] the yeas are 13, the nays are 21. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Gore	McCumber	Smoot
Chamberlain	Harding	Nelson	Sterling
Chilton	Hardwick	Norris	Sutherland
Clapp	Hitchcock	Pittman	Thomas
Clark	Hughes	Poindexter	Townsend
Cummins	Jones	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Curtis	Kenyon	Sheppard	Weeks
Fletcher	Kern	Sherman
Gallinger	Lane	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate upon the bill which is the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that I can not now, but I am about to make a motion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not object to the Senator's making a statement if, after he is through, I may make a statement in reference to the same matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to any debate on either side of the Chamber. Let the roll call be completed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the point of order that that can not be done when the calling of the roll has not been completed. The Senator from Michigan asked that the names of the absentees should be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that a motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not during the roll call.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There has been a roll call, and it has disclosed the absence of a quorum. The Chair has announced that no quorum is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been completed. The Senator from Michigan asks that the names of the absentees be called.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But that has not been done.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a part of the roll call, always.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will decide that the calling of the absentees had not been ordered, although asked for, and that a motion to adjourn is in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, let the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BRYAN, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. OWEN, Mr. REED, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. WALSH, Mr. WORKS, and Mr. OVERMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absentees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. I make the point of order that the motion is clearly dilatory, because the Senate has just refused to adjourn and no business has intervened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion is in order when there is no quorum developed. As at present advised the Chair holds that the motion is in order. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GORE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer that I did on the former ballot and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I did on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired, but, as previously announced, my pair has been transferred, and I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called, Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when has name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as on the former vote and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I did on the former vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STONE (after having voted in the negative). Of course, it does not take a quorum to adjourn; the roll call shows that the number of Senators present is very much short of a quorum, and I wish to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bryan	Overman	Shields	Vardaman
Culberson	Pittman	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Gore	Saulsbury	Stone

Mr. Sharkey, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. No quorum has voted. Let the roll be called. The message can not be received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is in order to receive a message from the President:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

RECEPTION OF, WITHOUT A QUORUM.

[49th Cong., 1st sess.; J., p. 1288, Aug. 5, 1886.]

The President pro tempore (Mr. Sherman) decided that less than a quorum could not take a recess. (See Cong. Record, p. 8022.)

At same time decided that less than a quorum could receive a message from the President of the United States, because the rules do not exclude a message from the House of Representatives or the President in absence of a quorum. (J., pp. 1288, 1289; idem., p. 8022.)

That is laid down in Gilfry's Precedents.

Mr. SMOOT. That is where there was no question of a quorum raised. It has now been developed that there is no quorum present, and nothing can be done until a quorum is developed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. SMOOT. No business is in order under the rule.

Mr. STONE. I personally would like to ask first whether, and then why, the Senator from Utah objects to receiving a message from the President.

Mr. SMOOT. I have just stated that under the rule of the Senate no business can be done by the Senate until a quorum has been developed. I have no objection to receiving a message from the President at any time when, under the rules of the Senate, it can rightfully be done. It is not that I have any objection to the message of the President, it is because under the rule no business can be done with the exception of an adjournment until a quorum has been developed.

Mr. STONE. I confess I am not familiar with the exact rule the occupant of the Chair has just read——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Chair state the particular precedent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is found in Precedents, Decisions on Points of Order, with Phraseology, in the United States, compiled by Henry H. Gilfry, page 473, under the head of "President's message—reception of, without a quorum."

The ruling was made August 5, 1886.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to know the ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President pro tempore, Mr. Sherman, decided that "less than a quorum could not take a recess," and "at the same time decided that less than a quorum could receive a message from the President of the United States."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The rule itself permits the reception of the message. It only excludes debate and motions, except a motion to adjourn. It does not exclude the reception of a message from the President.

And until a quorum shall be present no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.

It does not deny the right to receive a message from the President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think we have higher authority than the rules of the Senate forbidding the Senate when less than a quorum is present to receive a message from the President. The Constitution itself provides that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

The Constitution clearly contemplates that when less than a majority are present no business can be transacted except the business which the Constitution itself prescribes. If this is business, and I take it it is, we are powerless to do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is certainly not business. It would be an absurd proposition to so term the merely ministerial work of the Presiding Officer and the Secretary in receiving a message when it arrives, while the Senate suspends its operations. To call that business seems to me to be a violent stretch of the English language.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What would the Senator call it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not business of the Senate. The Senate is not transacting business. The Senate suspends business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is business of the country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senate suspends business that the President's message may be delivered to the proper officer of the Senate. It is not the transaction of business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What would the Senator call it if it is not to be called business?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not to consider it; at the present time the Senate simply suspends operations while the message is delivered to the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is the only precedent before the Chair, and, so far as the Chair knows, it is the only one. The ruling was held by the President pro tempore, Mr. Sherman:

An appeal was taken, but because of a want of a quorum it was not entertained by the President pro tempore. (Journal, p. 1288; CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 8022, 8023.)

Same points decided same way and message of the President was read. (Journal, p. 1292; CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8022.)

That seems to be the only precedent on the subject, and the Chair will receive the message.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, was announced by the Assistant Doorkeeper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will receive it.

Mr. Sharkey said: "The President of the United States directs me to deliver to the Senate a message in writing."

The message was delivered to the Secretary and handed to the Presiding Officer.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me inquire what was the action of the Senate with reference to the message?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message was received.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senate has taken that action?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has received the message.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I understand less than a quorum of the Senate has taken the action which the Chair has indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to procure the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senate, not having a quorum, received a message from the President of the United States. Will it be in order, without a quorum, for me to ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the biographies of the gentlemen constituting the Shipping Board as it has been reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that would not be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is generally out of order——

Mr. GALLINGER. I directed my inquiry to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that it would not be in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chair rules that it would not be in order. The Chair is right, undoubtedly.

Mr. STONE. The Chair was right before, and he is right now. The Chair is right in ruling that the Senate——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I propounded a parliamentary inquiry and received a reply, but debate is not in order in the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point well taken. No debate is in order.

Mr. STONE. That silences me.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the roll should be called in view of the fact that the last vote showed the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. What was the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order was that on the last roll call no quorum was disclosed and that the roll should be called now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably.

Mr. SMOOT. For the absentees.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I ask that the roll be called.

Mr. CUMMINS. What becomes of the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to bring in the absent Members?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is still operative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is still in effect.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that order was entered the roll was called for absentees, and nothing can be done now until a quorum has been developed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then there was a yea-and-nay vote which disclosed that there was no quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. There was a yea-and-nay vote on adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That disclosed that there was no quorum. Now there is no roll to which absent Senators may be added.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have a new roll call.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest that the roll be called.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Chair a parliamentary question. I ask whether, when on a call it is disclosed that a quorum is not present and the motion in due course has been made that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request or, it may be, to enforce the attendance of absent Senators, anything else is in order in the ordinary course of the business of the Senate except to bring in the absent Members? If that be not true, it seems to me that we might go on making one motion after another and bring ourselves into the very entanglement now presented, where a motion is made, a roll call is had upon it, which again discloses that there is no quorum present, and then some other motion is made to bring in absent Senators or to have a roll call for absent Senators. If this is to go on we would pile one thing upon another interminably. The Senate must proceed with some degree of order and system. So it seems to me, as a matter of common sense and, I think, according to the practices of this body, whenever it is disclosed that a quorum is not present and we reach a stage in the proceedings where a motion is made and agreed to that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to bring in the absent Senators by request or by compulsion, as the case may be, the Senate is at a standstill until the Sergeant at Arms has reported.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Supposing the Sergeant at Arms does not find Senators?

Mr. STONE. Then he can report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Suppose the Sergeant at Arms does not find absent Senators, are we to stay here forever?

Mr. STONE. We can stay here until he reports that they can not be found, and if they can not be found the Senate takes its own course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not recall any precedents since I have been in the Senate upon the question that is now under consideration. Unquestionably, when the lack of a quorum is disclosed by a vote upon a roll call, a call of the roll for a quorum is necessary; but when we have called for a quorum and that call has failed to disclose a quorum and a motion to adjourn is made, which can be passed upon without a quorum, it does not seem to me good practice to abandon, and I find nothing in the rules that requires us to abandon, the first call for a quorum. On the contrary, the practical way of doing business would be to stand by that call, accept the presence of Senators when they come into the Senate, and complete that original call for a quorum. I do not know what the precedents have been; I do not recall any precedents on the subject; but, if it be true that when we have a roll call to ascertain whether there is a quorum present, and then a motion to adjourn can require, if the lack of a quorum is disclosed by it, starting all over again with the roll call for a quorum, which could at once be followed by a motion for adjournment—those two propositions could keep the Senate in session continuously without the ability to force the presence of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, we have been proceeding here somewhat out of order. I desire to make a statement to the effect that it seems to me there is a determination to prevent the attendance of a quorum and to prevent the consideration of this bill. This bill could have been passed——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I raise the point of order that the Senator from Michigan is out of order. I ask the Chair not to allow the Senator to proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was simply asking for the return of the courtesy in which the Senator indulged, and as to which I did not object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken, Mr. President. I was discussing a question of order which was before the Chair and not anything else. I was seeking to induce a ruling that would facilitate the procurement of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Georgia is not in order. He has been indulging in debate. I propose simply to state something that might facilitate the procedure this afternoon.

Mr. HUGHES. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I should like the Chair to enforce the third clause of Rule V, which is found on page 7 of the Manual, which provides that after the Sergeant at Arms has been instructed to compel the attendance of absent Senators "and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The point of order was raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] that it would be necessary to call the roll, inasmuch as since it had been ascertained that there was no quorum present, a motion had been made to call the names of absent Senators, and still, no quorum developing, a motion was then made to compel the attendance of absent Senators. Then a motion was made to adjourn; and upon that motion the yeas and nays were ordered, when it developed that there was no quorum. The Senator from Texas has raised the point that the only thing to do now is to call the roll for a quorum, and that the summoning of absent Senators to add to the original list disclosed on the first roll call would not be a proper practice. The Chair is rather inclined to that view. It might facilitate matters to begin anew with the roll call in order to ascertain whether a quorum is present, because it may be that Senators who answered on the prior roll call are not now here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is always so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to violate the rule. What is going to happen here to-day is evident. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] be permitted to make a brief statement. That can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does it bear on the question now before the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. It does, so far as the question of adjournment, which is now before the Senate, is concerned.

Mr. STONE. If it is going to be in the nature of debate or criticism or anything of that kind, I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator had better agree to my request. Then, if the courtesy is abused, he can raise an objection. I do not think, however, it will be abused.

Mr. STONE. I think I will not consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; then we shall stay here a while.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, bearing upon the point upon which the Chair seems about to rule, I should like to submit the question whether or not a ruling such as the Chair indicated would not bar entirely the power of the Senate to call in absent Senators or to compel their attendance, because, while the order is in process of execution, if a motion to adjourn is made, which should disclose the absence of a quorum, another roll call is had, another order made, and then a motion is made to adjourn, it seems to me that we should have a going around and around and around, which would absolutely prohibit, if any Senator so desired, the carrying out of the order for the arrest or the request for the presence of absent Senators. I submit that suggestion for the consideration of the Chair.

Mr. STONE. That is just what I stated awhile ago. I think the Senator from Wyoming is absolutely right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On the question of order I want to say very briefly that, as I remember the practice of the Senate, it has been universally as stated by the Senator from Missouri and by the Senator from Wyoming. After the Sergeant at Arms has been instructed to compel the attendance of absent Senators, no more suggestions of the absence of a quorum are in order. The names of those who have been recorded as present, although they were less than a quorum, have stood on the list; and as the Sergeant at Arms produced the absent Senators one by one, the Secretary called their names as they entered the Chamber, and they answered to their names. Whenever a quorum was present the order to the Sergeant at Arms was vacated, and a quorum was established on that roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That undoubtedly is the case, except in an instance where there has been a yea-and-nay vote taken, and as a result of that yea-and-nay vote it was disclosed that there was no quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Chair will bear with me one minute upon that point, the suggestion occurs to me that, inasmuch as the only business that a number of Senators less than a quorum can transact, is to adjourn, the fact that that motion may be made and the yeas and nays had upon it, does not suspend the third clause of Rule V. Already there was disclosed the absence of a quorum, and the Senate had directed the Sergeant at Arms to supply the presence of a quorum. The fact that on the only motion that can be made during the absence of a quorum, to wit, the motion to adjourn, a continued lack of a quorum is shown, does not at all change or suspend clause 3 of Rule V, and does not vacate the order to the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Chair will allow me to make one other suggestion upon the same point of order, suppose the roll was called which disclosed the lack of a quorum and the motion was made to direct the Sergeant at Arms to notify absent Senators; that a call for a yea-and-nay vote was asked for upon that question, and there was a majority vote for it, but that vote disclosed that there was no quorum the motion would be lost, but then we would have to go back and call the roll for a quorum. Under such conditions we could not proceed at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will overrule the point of order raised by the Senator from Texas, and proceed—perhaps that is the quickest way—to ascertain if enough Senators have been produced to make a quorum, going back to a former roll call. The suggestion from the Secretary to the effect that there was no roll to which these names might be added raised some doubt in the mind of the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask if the Sergeant at Arms is ready to report under the order of the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. What is pending before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to take up House bill 408.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the question as to whether or not that motion is in order. I call attention to Rule XXII, which provides:

RULE XXII.

PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS.

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table.
To postpone indefinitely.
To postpone to a day certain.
To commit.
To amend.

When a question is pending those are the only motions that can be made under our rules, and they take precedence in the order named. Is it not true, I will ask the Chair, that the question of the consideration of Senate bill 392 was pending before the Senate? If that be the case, the only motions that can be made are as provided under Rule XXII, and a motion to take up another bill from the calendar is not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think that we can not after 2 o'clock displace one measure by taking up another; that that power is not in the hands of the Senate? And will he let me ask him further if it is not true that we have done that over and over again?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And does not that grow out of the joint application of the rule the Senator has read and Rule IX?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means Rule VIII.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; Rule IX, which contains an express provision relative to the matter.

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understand, there is now a quorum present.

Mr. STONE. I make the point of order——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I can raise a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order is being raised, and that is in order.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Utah was on the floor, and then——

Mr. GALLINGER. He yielded to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask whether the unfinished business has been formally laid before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is before the Senate on motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was taken up this morning on motion and was before the Senate at 2 o'clock. It was not formally laid down at that time. The motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is the pending motion, and the yeas and nays were ordered on that motion, as the Chair understands.

Mr. STONE. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President, that no business has intervened since the question of a quorum was determined.

Mr. STONE. We have had debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not the transaction of business, Mr. President, and it has been so ruled.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not only that, but the absence of a quorum can not be suggested when another Senator has the floor.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator desires to speak, I do not care about that, if that is what he wishes.

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not yielded for any such purpose.

Mr. HUGHES. I maintain the Senator has not got the floor. It was yielded to him by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That makes the Senator from Utah lose the floor, if any Senator objects to it.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to the Senator from Utah or any other Senator farming out the floor. In my own right I asked and received recognition; and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I insist that that motion is out of order, and that I have the floor.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has not the floor of right.

Mr. KENYON. I make the point of order that the Senator from Missouri has not been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. STONE. Neither has the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that both Senators are out of order. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the roll was being called on that question. There is nothing in order but to complete the roll call on the motion of the Senator from Montana to take up House bill 408.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question that is pending. The roll was being called on that question, and that is the only thing in order. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when the name of Mr. LEE of Maryland was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of his pair as heretofore, the occupant of the chair votes "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I make the same announcement as to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] as on the former roll calls.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote. I ask to be counted for a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Making the same announcement with reference to my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. Announcing my pair and its transfer as previously, I vote "yea."

Mr. REED. Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I make the same announcement of my pair as on the previous votes and vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WADSWORTH (after having voted in the negative). When I voted I neglected to announce that I transferred my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. I desire, therefore, to have my vote stand.

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 18, nays 25, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 22, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, once more in the onward sweep of time Thou has brought us very near the anniversary of the greatest event in all history; and we praise Thy holy name for the heavenly gift which discloses Thy character and makes the whole world akin. And we pray that the hearts of all men may be brought into harmony, and that right speedily; that they may join in the angelic chorus which has been coming down the ages, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men; that Thy kingdom may indeed come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.

And now, O Heavenly Father, as we pause in the daily routine of life in recognition of the great event, open Thou our hearts to the needs of the unfortunate, the poor, the needy, the "down-and-outs," that our hearts may be filled with gladness and our homes with joy; in the spirit of the Lord Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NOMINATIONS TO FILL COMMITTEE VACANCIES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to nominate to fill the majority vacancy on the Committee on Naval Affairs the Hon. W. W. VENABLE, and to fill the majority vacancy on the Committee on Mines and Mining the Hon. OTIS WINGO.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations? If not the Clerk will report these nominations.

The Clerk read as follows:

To fill vacancy on Naval Affairs, Hon. W. W. VENABLE; Mines and Mining, Hon. OTIS WINGO.

The question was taken, and the nominations were agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5617. An act to confer jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota to hear, try, and determine the value of certain pine timber.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 407, the same having been agreed to and adopted in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma calls up the conference report. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 407) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the statement.

[For conference report and statement see House proceedings of December 18, 1916.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire some time?

Mr. MANN. I want to make a little statement for a few minutes, not about the substance, but the form of the conference report.

Mr. FERRIS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. I do not know.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as the gentleman may desire out of my hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, without making any criticism of the conference report, but merely for the purpose of calling the attention of Members to the method of making up the conference report, I want to make a little statement. When the House passes a bill the bill is engrossed and sent to the Senate. That is the only official copy of the bill, the engrossed copy, which accompanies all communications between the two Houses. If the Senate adds amendments, those amendments are engrossed, and reference is made in page and line to the original engrossed copy of the House, and when the two Houses finally act that original engrossed copy with amendments which might be added goes to the enrolling clerk and he makes up the enrolled bill from that. As a matter of convenience we print the House bill with Senate amendments, Senate amendments numbered and interlined in the bill in italics, but that is not the official copy that goes to the engrossing clerk, and where an amendment is offered, as in this case in the conference report, by reference to this unofficial copy instead of the official copy, the clerk has to guess at what the two Houses mean when he goes to enroll the bill, and it is never safe for the enrolling clerk to guess at what goes in the enrolled bill. Now, in this case reference is made to page 3, line 12, after the word "areas," insert the following: "of the character herein described"; but there is no such word as "areas" on page 3, line 12, of the engrossed copy of the bill. Then again, page 9, line 22, after the word "lands," add the following. There is no such word as "lands" on page 9, line 22, of the copy of the bill which goes to the clerk to be enrolled. I imagine in this case the clerk will be able to guess correctly and enroll the bill correctly, and yet members of the conference committee, or their clerks, ought to be very careful when they refer to page and line of the engrossed bill to have the engrossed bill to properly refer to; so that mistakes will not occur and then the error be laid to the enrolling clerk of one of the Houses.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the managers on the part of the House I am for myself and the conferees indebted to the gentleman from Illinois for making the suggestion. It is true that in drawing up this report I do not wish to put the responsibility on the clerk who really drew the report, as I signed it. What the clerk really did was he used the House bill with Senate amendments, and in the conference report made reference to the Senate amendments in the House print rather than the final print, which, of course, is not the proper way and is necessarily confusing to the enrolling clerk and is not what it should be. I am very much indebted and obliged to the gentleman from Illinois. It shows so well how useful he is in the House in helping to keep things straight. I signed it hurriedly and the other conferees did also. The clerk drew up the conference report, as clerks do in all such cases. I have already talked with the enrolling room, and they understand it and will enroll it properly. I am always glad to have the suggestions and help of the gentleman from Illinois, and am usually benefited by it also.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for five minutes?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, at this time I am not going to take the time allotted me. We are now about to consummate the last and final legislative act that will insure this bill becoming a law. This bill passed the House early in this Congress and then the Senate on the last day of the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and it is one whose enactment has been looked forward to by the people of the West with much interest. It means great activity and new development of the 16 public lands to which it will apply. While the conferees did not give all that was called for in the original bill, they have so adjusted it as to make it workable, and the law will be of much benefit to the development of the West.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. I am always willing to give the West what it needs. Will the gentleman please tell us what this bill does as finally agreed on by the conferees? What changes does it make in the law, and what kind of lands does it affect?

Mr. RAKER. I have not time to give the gentleman the information he requires at this time. The chairman can and will give that to the gentleman. I only wish I had the time.

Mr. WINGO. I did not think there was anything the gentleman from California could not explain in five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I thank the distinguished Member from Arkansas. That is not exactly so. The bill will assist in developing the West greatly, and it is a piece of legislation that will add much to the future development of the public land in Western States. [Applause.] I want to add to my statement what Commissioner Tallman says on this subject in his report of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, pages 27 to 307.

HOMESTEADS, LARGE AND SMALL.

From time to time inquiries are addressed to this office in the interest of proposed legislation looking toward a distribution of our public lands in such manner as to secure the highest form of permanent development. This is especially true in connection with the disposition of lands properly classified as agricultural, though ranging from the high fertility of a well-watered country to the semidesert condition of the arid and nonirrigable region.

Not an infrequent criticism of our public-land system has been based upon the fact that an absolute title is passed from the United States to the entryman, who thereafter is in full control of the land and may make such use thereof as may seem best to him. This, it is said, is conducive to speculative entries, so that people not really desirous of acquiring permanent homes or developing their lands to that end, but only seeking temporary results, make entries, secure patents, and thereafter promptly dispose of the land, the result being that instead of making many small homes it operates in the interest of the large landholder.

In my last report I drew attention to the fact that a study was being made in this office of the operation of the homestead law in its several forms, and gave the results of this inquiry so far as then prosecuted. Since then I have secured further data on this general subject which I believe should be preserved for future reference.

The specific point to which this inquiry has been addressed is to determine the relative degree of permanent investment secured under the three best-known forms of homestead entry, distinguished by the area of each, to wit:

1. The homestead law of 160 acres.
2. The enlarged-homestead entry of 320 acres.
3. The Kinkaid homestead entry of 640 acres.

(1) The method adopted in studying this form of entry was to compile the data from the final proofs submitted on 10 homestead entries, taken at random from each of 95 districts of the public-land States, in comparatively recent cases.

These final proofs necessarily covered all kinds and varieties of the 160-acre homestead entry, but for the purpose in hand no distinction in that particular was made, and it was found that a total of 26,297 acres were cultivated in the 950 claims, and the entire value of the improvements placed thereon estimated at $751,151; so that the average cultivation per entry thus disclosed was 27 acres and the average value of the improvements on each farm $790.

From this but one deduction can be reached, and that in favor of the general good faith of the small homesteader and his bona fide intention of making a permanent home for himself on the public domain. Any other conclusion would not be warranted, especially when it is taken into consideration that, for the most part, these entrymen are largely dependent upon the labor of their own hands for the improvement and cultivation of the land as well as for their own maintenance during the time they are engaged in earning title to their homes.

(2) The study of the enlarged-homestead law to determine in what degree it had affected the settlement and development of the country generally was prosecuted through the field service.

This law permits taking as a homestead 320 acres of semiarid grazing lands which have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as not susceptible of successful irrigation at a reasonable cost from any known source of water supply. A careful study of the reports submitted justify the general conclusion that 320 acres of land of this character are absolutely necessary for the support of a family; that under the provisions of this law the farmer has been enabled to successfully combine the cultivation of a portion of the land in crop, with the use of the remainder for stock raising. With a smaller acreage of such land no such diversified investment of his capital and labor would be possible. The occupation and improvement of large areas of semiarid nonirrigable lands has therefore resulted through a practical combination of dry farming with stock raising. Here and there is encountered an expression of opinion that the law has been made use of for speculative ends, but this is the exception.

(3) The Kinkaid Act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stat., 547), permits the entry of 640 acres within a specified portion of the State of Nebraska, where the character of the soil is such that the ordinary forms of cultivation can not be successfully employed but cattle grazing is fairly remunerative. When this law was first proposed, and during the time of its discussion before Congress, it was then said that it would be made use of by wealthy stock growers who, under the provisions of the law, would be able to obtain large bodies of public land. The friends of the measure, however, believed that if the small owner could have title to sufficient land to graze a few cattle he would not readily part with the land, and this view finally prevailed in the adoption of the act as it now stands.

A study of the Kinkaid law, in its operation for the first 10 years after its passage, from June 28, 1904, to June 28, 1914, has been made. Complete lists, by counties, of the final proofs made under said act during that period were procured, and these lists referred to the proper county recorders in each county in order to ascertain to what extent the original ownership had been retained by the entrymen.

The figures thus obtained show the following:

	Acres.
Area in hands of small holders	6,422,963.09
Area in hands of large holders	303,553.32
Area in hands of original entrymen	4,589,870.91
Total area proved up on June 28, 1904, to June 28, 1914	6,726,516.41

It will be noted that the sum of the large and small holdings is the same as the total acreage proved up under the act. The acreage in the hands of original entrymen does not affect the total, as all lands in this column are included in either the large or small holdings column.

In addition to the statistical matter thus secured, a canvass was made through inquiries in the form of questions addressed to prominent and well-informed parties in every county in the Kinkaid district, as well as to a large number of entrymen under the act.

General conditions in the territory covered by the act were also made the subject of inquiry, and where statistics had been gathered by the State of Nebraska, and were available, a comparison was made between the 10 years prior to 1904 and the 10 years immediately thereafter. Statistics as to the increase in population, valuation of property, crops, live stock, etc., were thus obtained and preserved.

A few of the more pertinent figures are here submitted:

	Per cent.
Increase in voting population from 1904 to 1914	55
Increase in value of agricultural implements from 1904 to 1914	74
Increase in value of cattle from 1904 to 1914	34
Increase in acres planted to rye from 1904 to 1914	92
Increase in acres planted to oats from 1904 to 1914	80
Increase in acres planted to corn from 1904 to 1914	102
Increase in acres planted to wheat from 1904 to 1914	142
Increase in horses owned from 1904 to 1914	67
Increase in hogs owned from 1904 to 1914	31

In valuation of all property, the increase from 1892 to 1904 was 17 per cent, while from 1904 to 1914 the increase was 108 per cent.

The general result of the investigation of this law, under the first 10-year period of its operation, is such as to justify the original friends of the measure, it being apparent that the acreage taken up thereunder has for the greater part not been absorbed in large holdings, but continues to be held and cultivated by the small holder and entryman; and further, that during such period the territory covered thereby has made a marked advancement in every way, largely attributable to the operations of the law.

The final deduction from the entire study of this subject is justified that the enlargement of the homestead was a timely recognition that the area of the entry should be measured by the earning capacity of the land. In operation, the enlargement of the homestead entry to 320 acres may be recognized as a successful demonstration of this theory in that portion of the country where stock raising may be successfully united with dry farming, but not so in those communities where only cattle grazing is a profitable use of semiarid, nonirrigable land.

The stock-raising homestead bill now pending before Congress is in effect a recognition of this conclusion, making provision for a homestead entry for 640 acres of lands chiefly valuable for grazing.

I want to include as a part of my remarks the report on this bill by the Hon. A. A. JONES, then Assistant Secretary of the Interior—now Senator elect from New Mexico. That report is full and complete and shows the wisdom of this legislation. Long and tedious hearings were had upon this legislation by the House Committee on the Public Lands. I have stood for this legislation from the beginning. I know from personal observation of the West that it is needed and will meet the situation. It will assist in building up the country and make more homes, bring more land under cultivation, and increase the beef supply. Mr. JONES's statement and report is as follows:

The existing homestead laws of the United States show an evolution or adaptation to conditions which developed, or were found to exist, as public-land settlement and entry progressed. The original homestead laws limited the maximum area which might be entered to 160 acres, an ample area for a farm in the humid regions. The reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., 388), provided for a still smaller farm unit in certain cases adapted to the intensive farming suitable for irrigated lands.

In other sections of the West, particularly the high plateaus of the intermountain States, there were areas which would not produce remunerative crops under the ordinary methods of farming, but which will, through soil fallowing and moisture-conservation methods of dry farming, produce profitable crops of wheat and other grains. Such farming requires the use of a larger area of land, and by what is known as the enlarged-homestead laws of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), and June 17, 1910 (36 Stat., 531), Congress permitted the entry of not exceeding 320 acres of land of the character described, upon conditions of cultivation to agricultural crops of a prescribed acreage annually.

There remained, however, large areas of public lands to which none of the foregoing laws seem appropriate, and it is believed that a new form of homestead law should be enacted peculiarly adapted thereto. These lands, because of their arid or semiarid character, or because of their location on mountain tops or sides, will not produce agricultural crops for sale or exportation in sufficient quantities to justify acquirement thereof and residence thereon under existing laws. They do, however, possess some value for grazing purposes, and often include tracts of greater or less extent, upon which might be grown forage crops, such as kafir corn, milo maize, fodder, or other rough feed of little value for sale or importation, but valuable for winter feeding or for the fattening of range stock. I believe that with this class of lands a homestead of 640 acres of land would enable bona fide home seekers to establish and maintain homes for the purpose of stock raising and for such farming operations as will enable them to raise their own supply of rough feed for the stock pastured on the remaining lands entered or required.

For the protection of the entrymen as well as to prevent the entry of lands susceptible of irrigation, containing valuable merchantable timber, or principally valuable for purposes other than those expressed in the bill, it is provided that the lands shall, before being subject to entry, be designated by the Secretary of the Interior. All mineral within the lands are reserved to the United States, together with the right of qualified persons to prospect upon, locate, and enter such deposits under such restrictions as will prevent the destruction or injury of permanent improvements of the entrymen or patentees. This provision, like the requirement of designation, will operate to protect entrymen from protests and contests because of the character of the land, and which might otherwise result in cancellation of entries made. Another reason for the reservation of the minerals is that this law will induce the entry of lands in those mountainous regions where deposits of mineral are known to exist or are likely to be found. To issue unconditional patents for these comparatively large entries under the homestead laws might withdraw immense areas from prospecting and mineral development, and without such a reservation the disposition of these lands in the mineral country under agricultural laws would be of doubtful advisability.

The farmer-stockman is not seeking and does not desire the minerals, his experience and efforts being in the line of stock raising and farming, which operations can be carried on without being materially interfered with by the reservation of minerals and the prospecting for and removal of same from the land.

Because of the fact that the lands designated will be principally valuable for grazing, and that the farming operations will be limited to the growing of forage, no specific requirement is made as to cultivation, but instead the entryman is required to place permanent improvements upon the lands entered, tending to increase their value for stock-raising purposes of not less than $1.25 per acre.

Provision is made for additional entries where the owners and occupants of tracts within the designated area can find vacant land adjoining the tracts already owned and occupied. In some cases it may not be possible for such entrymen and landowners to exercise the right of additional entry because of the fact that no vacant lands adjoin. In such cases provision is made for the surrender of the lands so held and owned to the United States, after which the party so relinquishing or reconveying may make an original entry under this act of not exceeding 640 acres. This provision will cause an adjustment of holdings in such areas, and the lands so surrendered to the United States may, in turn, be entered by the entrymen or owners of the adjoining tracts.

In this connection provision is made for the exercise of a preference right of entry within 90 days after the passage of the act by the entryman or owner of adjoining land, and provision is made that where vacant lands contiguous to the tracts owned and held by two or more persons entitled to an additional entry are not sufficient in amount to enable each to secure the maximum amount to which entitled, for an equitable division of the lands applied for among the several entrymen or owners.

The purpose of the law being the establishment of homes upon the land entered, the bill provides that the commutation provision of the homestead laws shall not apply to such entries.

As suggested in my report of April 24, 1914, it is believed that it would be advisable to omit the proviso to section 2, found in lines 6 to 10, page 2 of the bill, thus leaving to the settler the responsibility of determining whether or not a specific 640 acres of land, designated under this act, would be sufficient for his purposes. Such has been the law and practice under the original and enlarged homestead acts, as well as the act of April 28, 1904, hereinbefore described. If, however, the committee believes some limitation to be essential, the proviso as it now stands is as far as the limitation should proceed.

It is believed that the other sections of the bill are as liberal in the way of additional entries or in the right to surrender lands already held and the making of new entries of the full amount as is advisable.

Since the last session of Congress the department has been seeking information as to the advisability of the passage of such a law as is now proposed by this bill. Attention has been especially directed to the operation of the act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stat., 547), which authorized the entry of not exceeding 640 acres of land in a considerable area of western Nebraska. The provisions of that act, as applying to that limited area, were in the main designed to meet the same conditions which the present bill proposes to meet as to other areas of the public lands. Eleven years have elapsed since the passage of the law relating to western Nebraska, and the investigations of the department as to the results of that legislation are both important and significant. Prior to the passage of the act of 1904 considerable land in western Nebraska had been entered under other laws, but the marvelous development since the passage of the act of 1904 is so marked that it must in great measure at least be attributed to that law. It has been found that some of the valleys and lower lands which intersperse the larger area have been made to produce through intensive cultivation varied crops of large value, and that the production of live stock has largely increased rather than diminished. The improvements placed by the settlers upon their claims indicate both prosperity and permanency of occupation, as dwellings of stone, cement, or frame construction, plastered and provided with conveniences, have generally supplanted the original sod houses.

The farmer who has not built barns, silos, or other structures for storing crops and protecting live stock is a rare exception. The live stock raised upon the small ranches is of a higher grade than that which was produced by grazing upon the vacant public lands.

It appears from statistics collected, covering 31 counties within the area to which said law is applicable, that the population was 124,508 in 1890, 107,434 in 1900, and 162,217 in 1910, an increase of nearly 50 per cent in population during said 10-year period, during 6 years of which the 640-acre homestead law was in force.

The value of household furniture increased from $174,779 in 1904 to $342,312 in 1914, an increase of 95 per cent.

The value of agricultural implements in 1904 was $139,609; in 1914, $243,304; increase, 74 per cent.

The value of cattle in 1904 was $3,176,109; in 1914, $4,267,055; increase, 34 per cent.

In 1904, 30 counties produced 69,962 bushels of potatoes; in 1914, 2,671,924 bushels; increase, 3,719 per cent.

Number of acres planted to rye in 27 counties in 1904, 47,451; in 1914, 91,336; increase, 92 per cent.

Number of acres planted to oats in 28 counties in 1904, 137,032; in 1914, 246,722; increase, 80 per cent.

Number of acres planted to corn in 28 counties in 1904, 564,554; in 1914, 1,143,916; increase, 102 per cent.

Number of acres planted to wheat in 27 counties in 1904, 122,799; in 1914, 297,900; increase, 142 per cent.

Number of horses in 31 counties in 1892, 107,295; in 1904, 168,556; increase, 57 per cent; in 1914, 282,624; increase, 67 per cent.

Number of hogs in 29 counties in 1904, 171,849; in 1914, 225,480; increase, 31 per cent.

The acreage of improved land in 27 counties increased 68 per cent in 12 years, 1892 to 1904; increased 77 per cent in 10 years, 1904 to 1914. The value of the improved land decreased 18 per cent the first period and increased 143 per cent the second.

The total assessed valuation of all property in 31 counties in 1892 was $23,468,899.69; in 1904, $27,480,836.57; increase, 17 per cent; in 1914, $57,278,766; increase, 108 per cent.

Of the land entered in Nebraska under the section law there is an average of 1 settler for every 571 acres. In the 37 counties affected by this law it appears that there are 4,589,870 acres in the hands of the original entrymen, 6,411,963 acres in the hands of small holders, and only 316,453 acres in the hands of what might be termed large holders; that is, those possessing areas in excess of 2,000 acres. The department is informed that the practically unanimous sentiment of the people in western Nebraska is that the law has been a benefit to them and to the country, causing a large increase in the population, promoting the development of the lands, and advancing generally the public welfare.

That a demand for the proposed legislation exists is undoubted, not only because existing laws are not adapted to large areas of remaining public lands, but because there is a widespread demand for such legislation in order that additional homes may be made upon the public domain. To secure further data upon the subject I called upon the various field agents of the General Land Office for information and for an expression of opinion with respect to such legislation.

As you are aware, the duties of these agents take them into all parts of the public-land area, and they have many and unusual opportunities for observing conditions. The reports generally show the need for some such legislation. The following quotations indicate the view taken by agents on duty in the States mentioned:

MONTANA.

"I believe that the enactment of a law providing for 640-acre homesteads will result in the production of a greater number of cattle than were found on these ranges during the most prosperous days of the cattle kings."

CALIFORNIA.

"After a long experience in the public-land States, it is my belief that at the present time a homestead law allowing a greater acreage than the present 320-acre law would be in order. The land that now remains subject to homestead entry is mostly rough and of doubtful value for agricultural purposes. But give a man enough of it, so that he can run a few head of stock and graze a few milch cows, and the chances are that he will remain there and make the land his permanent home."

WYOMING.

"A sufficient acreage of these lands should be given the homesteader to insure him a livelihood for his family by putting it to the use to which it is best adapted. The observation of the writer has been that 320 acres of such land is not a sufficient area to support a family by grazing stock, nor is it a unit which can be handled to the best advantage in an economic sense."

NEW MEXICO.

After commenting on the provisions of the enlarged-homestead act, which, the agent says, met with fair success in the northeastern part of the State, he says:

"In the other portions of the State it is not well adapted; 320 acres will not support a family; the productive capacity of the country is not sufficient to maintain a family on each tract of this size. * * *

"The units should be higher, at least 640 acres; with this amount of land some 40 head of cows could be pastured and dairying carried on with the fodder and silage raised, and a fair living be assured the homesteader on the 15-inch and better rainfall land and a poor living on the 10-inch to 15-inch rainfall land."

COLORADO.

"Settlement is now pushing west to a different character of land—lands fully as rich and richer for agriculture, but producing naturally a much scantier pasturage—and it requires a larger area for that purpose to support sufficient stock to make the settler a prosperous home, and settlement is slower. * * * If the law permitting a homestead on 640 acres is passed it will tend to build up that section of the country most adapted to grazing, and the land will be put to its best possible use."

As stated at the beginning of the report, the original 160-acre homestead law and the enlarged homestead law permitting the entry of 320 acres have contributed enormously to the agricultural development of the public-land States and are still being taken advantage of by homeseekers in those localities where the soil, rainfall, and climate permit the making of homes upon the areas therein described.

This measure covers another and different class of lands, extensive in area, to which the existing laws are not suitable, and will, in my opinion, secure the settlement upon and improvement of a very large area of our public-land States, adding materially to the wealth and well-being of the country and providing homes for thousands of citizens who would otherwise be unable to take advantage of the homestead features of our public-land laws. It will wisely supplement existing laws, open a new field, and unquestionably add to the well-being not only of the States wherein the lands are located but of the entire country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the conference report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the chairman of the committee explain this matter briefly. This bill was up in the last session of Congress. To be perfectly frank with the gentleman, I will say that I know at that time I took considerable interest in it. At least I think it was this bill, but it has escaped my mind for the moment as to what it is. And for that reason I would like to have him explain what changes have been made.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say to the gentleman that in the 15 Western States there are approximately 300,000,000 acres of arid, semiarid, nonirrigable, nontimbered land. In Alaska there are 370,000,000 acres. Of course, not all of these areas will come under this bill, but quite a large part of it will. As the law stands, most of this land will never be used for any purpose. The unit of entry is so small it will not sustain a family. An entryman could take up only 160 acres, or, at most, 320, that is worth anything for agricultural purposes. This bill raises the unit from 320 to 640 acres, so that the little draws, ravines, and lowlands may be used for raising fodder, like cane, Kaffir corn, and other crops requiring little moisture, with which to sustain animal life, and they can use the poorer uplands that are dry and arid for grazing. They can not, of course, only enter this dry, arid character of land. Before they can enter under this bill at all the Interior Department must find four things; first, that it is chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops; second, it must not contain merchantable timber; third, it is not susceptible of irrigation from any known water supply; and, fourth, 640 acres will be required to properly sustain a family. This, of course, renders it a grazing proposition. The land in the humid areas can be entered and used under the smaller unit.

Mr. WINGO. Does it apply only to arid lands?

Mr. FERRIS. It applies only to arid lands. And they could not make an entry of that kind in my State or the gentleman's State. If it is irrigable, they can not take it. If it is timberland, they can not take it; and if it is mineral, they can not take it; and it requires that 640 acres is reasonably required to support a family in order that an entryman may make entry at all. In other words, if it is unnecessary to have 640 acres to sustain a family, they must enter it under the 320 or the 160 acre law.

Mr. ADAIR. Who makes this finding?

Mr. FERRIS. The Interior Department and the Geological Survey, just the same as they do under the existing 320-acre law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from California indicated that this would do very much toward developing the Western States, and the gentleman from Oklahoma has indicated that 15 Western States are interested, and that there are millions of acres of arid and semiarid lands for disposal under this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I think there is more acreage than that. I think more than half can well be designated under this law. Perhaps three-fourths of it. Of course, some of it is worthless and would not be taken at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This western distribution of lands is not to the prejudice of the rights of eastern settlers to present their claims along with the residents of the 15 Western States?

Mr. FERRIS. Not in the least. They are invited to come and take up the land. But my thought was that if the people from the cities and the crowded centers and from the East could be induced to come out there and help settle up those States it would be of benefit all around. The people of the East desire homes. The Western States want people to help them develop the West.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain how the people in the congested cities could obtain a portion of this land? I think such a statement would be interesting.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say to the gentleman, for example, that if a citizen of Philadelphia desired to take up one of these dry grazing homesteads, and take himself and his family, he would first go to the local land office and make application to enter 640 acres of that dry, arid land. The registers and the receivers of the land office, who are the custodians, would make a note of the application, but would not finally allow it. They would hold it in suspense until a representative of the Interior Department could go there and make an investigation, and find, first, if it is nontimber, nonmineral, nonirrigable, and if that 640 acres would be required to support a family. If so, then the entry would be allowed. The settler could move on, live there three years, comply with the provisions of the homestead law, and get his title.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he provides the means for that house himself?

Mr. FERRIS. He does. The applicant has to initiate the settlement and comply with the law. He has to do all that. The Government does not help him on that. And if the little valleys or little draws or little slews have enough moisture in them to raise cane and fodder and Kaffir corn, and those crops that will grow without much rainfall, and let his few sheep and few cattle graze on the untaken land, we hoped in that way he might make a home.

Mr. MANN. "Cain't" is about all they can raise out there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The crop the gentleman from Illinois refers to can be raised in any section of the country, if anybody is disposed to raise it?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely. Here or elsewhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I am after some real information. If the West is to be developed, as indicated by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who displays a very great interest in the West, I presume the people of the East must be drawn upon largely to attain that purpose?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. They are invited. Some will succeed; some will fail. That is only the story of a human life everywhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And if that is worth while to the people of the West, it must be worth while to the people of the East. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, having advanced the apportionment from 320 to 640 acres as proposed here, the 640 acres of land is of such a quality as would enable an ordinary man, without any expert knowledge of farming, or especially of dry farming, as you call it, to actually sustain himself and his family upon that tract of land?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his family, along with myself and my family, journeyed over some of that land last summer and saw it, and now the gentleman knows from personal observation, as I know from personal contact, that upon it, or upon a great deal of it, they can not make a living. But this legislation will enable them to take up a lot of it, and it will increase production and necessarily reduce the cost of living and put some of that land under cultivation and produce homesteads. I do not think they can settle up all that land. Some of it is absolutely worthless. Some people unaccustomed to the privations of homesteading will fail, others will succeed. The entire West and East, too, has been settled on that basis and in that way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let this be understood: On Sunday last I passed by a place in my own city where 90 men were standing in the snow awaiting an opportunity to go into a clubhouse provided by some church people, to obtain something to eat. Think of it—90 men, in these times of prosperity, were standing on the sidewalk on Sunday afternoon in the snow, waiting for something to eat. That condition would not hold in the gentleman's country, but it sometimes holds in mine. Now, we should enable these men to go onto the land somewhere and obtain a livelihood, if they desire to do it. What I would like to know is where they can go for information? How can they get the information that will enable them to go upon the land?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, I know that the gentleman does not expect me to go into politics about this matter, and I will not pay any attention to his reference to the idle men, because——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is not politics. It is a serious matter, not a laughing matter.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman was inquiring of me as to how they would have to go about it, and I was simply——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know; but if we are going to give away 15,000,000 acres or more of land, I want to know if the people of my section will have the right to get some of it.

Mr. FERRIS. They have the right. We in the West, in most cases, have already exhausted our homestead rights and can not enter at all. The gentleman or any of his constituents would have the right to go into any State where the land is situated; but before going there, he would do well to write to the General Land Office for full instructions and details as to what can be done, and, of course, any of the gentleman's constituents can write to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and get a copy of the law, and from that law, and together with the instructions that he can get from the General Land Office he can obtain all the needed information he desires or needs. No one should go out there expecting a snap. It is probable the weaker ones will drop out and fail. They fail everywhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the information that is available now at the General Land Office show where the land is listed?

Mr. FERRIS. The unentered land is listed, and it is available, but under this bill the character of land is not yet available until the law is signed and rules and regulations to be used in connection with it are worked out under it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I may say to the gentleman that I have gone through that western territory. The gentleman is right about that. I have gone through the northwestern and soutwestern sections, and I noticed that a great many people who had gone in on arid land had not made good.

Mr. FERRIS. That is so, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have noticed also that there has been a considerable number of bills coming in here that have extended the time in which homesteaders would be permitted to make good. Many of these people had gone on the lands, much to their own detriment and misfortune. It seems to me that with all these 15,000,000 acres of land unoccupied every man ought to have an equal right to find out about it and get some of it, but he ought to have enough advance information to prevent deception.

Mr. FERRIS. I can say to the gentleman that there will be no preferences or favors shown. Every man will have an equal chance to go out there, after this row is past, and exercise his rights.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the ordinary man in the East can get the necessary information from the Land Office as well as any other man?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. FERRIS. As chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House, aided by a faithful committee of 22 members, I have labored in season and out to secure the passage of this legislation. It passed the House of Representatives in January, 1916. It went to the Senate and passed the Senate during the last day of the session, on September 8. It passed the Senate so late in the session that it was impossible to get the amendments agreed to or to secure the appointment of a conference committee during the last day of the session. On the first day of this session—December 4—I immediately had conferees appointed and began the task of getting the legislation finally adopted, through the Congress, and made available for the homeless citizens who desire to enter public lands in the West.

Roughly, there are 300,000,000 acres of public lands in the 15 public-land States of the West and approximately 375,000,000 acres in Alaska. Some of this land is totally worthless and will not be taken up under this law or any other law for homesteading purposes. However, a large portion of it, in my opinion, will be utilized under this law. It is the largest unit that has ever been applied to the entire public-land area. It is found necessary due to the arid character of the lands remaining undisposed of. All over the country there is a cry going up from homeless citizens desiring to acquire a home. All through the sparsely settled States of the West they are appealing for more people to come there and take up residence among them. This legislation will go a long ways toward bringing the landless man in contact with the vacant public domain of this country. It will afford him a unit large enough to enable him to make a living for his family and aid in the development of the West. If the law accomplishes this, we shall feel proud of our labors. I feel confident it will work great good, furnish thousands of homes for homeless citizens, and enable them to get a start in life that they otherwise could not secure.

I beg to print herewith the written report on this legislation from the Interior Department, which goes into this matter quite in detail and makes us feel confident that our labors are justified, that the legislation we have passed is feasible, workable, and of aid in the development of the West. The report follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 15, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your request for report on H. R. 407, a bill to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

This bill is identical with H. R. 15799, passed by the House of Representatives January 18, 1915. The matter therein treated was the subject of reports to your committee by this department January 30 and April 24, 1914, in which the importance of the enactment of legislation authorizing the entry, under the public-land laws, of a larger area than is at present permitted for a specified class of lands was urged.

As stated in said reports, the existing homestead laws of the United States show an evolution or adaptation to conditions which developed or were found to exist as public-land settlement and entry progressed. The original homestead laws limited the maximum area which might be entered to 160 acres, an ample area for a farm in the humid regions. The reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., 388), provided for a still smaller farm unit in certain cases adapted to the intensive farming suitable for irrigated lands. In other sections of the West, particularly the high plateaus of the intermountain States, there were areas which would not produce remunerative crops under the ordinary methods of farming, but which will through soil fallowing and moisture-conservation methods of dry farming produce profitable crops of wheat and other grains. Such farming requires the use of a larger area of land, and by what is known as the enlarged-homestead laws of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), and June 17, 1910 (36 Stat., 531), Congress permitted the entry of not exceeding 320 acres of land of the character described, upon conditions of cultivation to agricultural crops of a prescribed acreage annually.

There remained, however, large areas of public lands to which none of the foregoing laws seem appropriate, and it is believed that a new form of homestead law should be enacted peculiarly adapted thereto. These lands, because of their arid or semiarid character, or because of their location on mountain tops or sides, will not produce agricultural crops for sale or exportation in sufficient quantities to justify acquirement thereof and residence thereon under existing laws. They do, however, possess some value for grazing purposes, and often include tracts of greater or less extent, upon which might be grown forage crops, such as kafir corn, milo maize, fodder, or other rough feed of little value for sale or importation, but valuable for winter feeding or for the fattening of range stock. I believe that with this class of lands a homestead of 640 acres of land would enable bona fide homeseekers to establish and maintain homes for the purpose of stock raising and for such farming operations as will enable them to raise their own supply of rough feed for the stock pastured on the remaining lands entered or acquired.

The following brief comments upon the bill as introduced are herewith submitted:

For the protection of the entrymen, as well as to prevent the entry of lands susceptible of irrigation, containing valuable merchantable timber, or principally valuable for purposes other than those expressed in the bill, it is provided that the lands shall, before being subject to entry, be designated by the Secretary of the Interior. All mineral within the lands are reserved to the United States, together with the right of qualified persons to prospect upon, locate, and enter such deposits under such restrictions as will prevent the destruction or injury of permanent improvements of the entrymen or patentees. This provision, like the requirement of designation, will operate to protect entrymen from protests and contests because of the character of the land, and which might otherwise result in cancellation of entries made. Another reason for the reservation of the minerals is that this law will induce the entry of lands in those mountainous regions where deposits of mineral are known to exist or are likely to be found. To issue unconditional patents for these comparatively large entries under the homestead laws might withdraw immense areas from prospecting and mineral development, and without such a reservation the disposition of these lands in the mineral country under agricultural laws would be of doubtful advisability.

The farmer-stockman is not seeking and does not desire the minerals, his experience and efforts being in the line of stock raising and farming, which operations can be carried on without being materially interfered with by the reservation of minerals and the prospecting for and removal of same from the land.

Because of the fact that the lands designated will be principally valuable for grazing, and that the farming operations will be limited to the growing of forage, no specific requirement is made as to cultivation, but instead the entryman is required to place permanent improvements upon the lands entered, tending to increase their value for stock-raising purposes, of not less than $1.25 per acre.

Provision is made for additional entries where the owners and occupants of tracts within the designated area can find vacant land adjoining the tracts already owned and occupied. In some cases it may not be possible for such entrymen and landowners to exercise the right of additional entry because of the fact that no vacant lands adjoin. In such cases provision is made for the surrender of the lands so held and owned to the United States, after which the party so relinquishing or reconveying may make an original entry under this act of not exceeding 640 acres. This provision will cause an adjustment of holdings in such areas, and the lands so surrendered to the United States may, in turn, be entered by the entrymen or owners of the adjoining tracts.

In this connection provision is made for the exercise of a preference right of entry within 90 days after the passage of the act by the entryman or owner of adjoining land, and provision is made that where vacant lands contiguous to the tracts owned and held by two or more persons entitled to an additional entry are not sufficient in amount to enable each to secure the maximum amount to which entitled, for an equitable division of the lands applied for among the several entrymen or owners. The purpose of the law being the establishment of homes upon the land entered, the bill provides that the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to such entries.

As suggested in my report of April 24, 1914, it is believed that it would be advisable to omit the proviso to section 2, found in lines 6 to 10, page 2, of the bill, thus leaving to the settler the responsibility of determining whether or not a specific 640 acres of land, designated under this act, would be sufficient for his purposes. Such has been the law and practice under the original and enlarged homestead acts, as well as the act of April 28, 1904, hereinbefore described. If, however, the committee believes some limitation to be essential, the proviso as it now stands is as far as the limitation should proceed.

I also suggest the advisability of omitting section 6 of the bill, which proposes to give the right of additional entry, where no adjoining lands are vacant, within a radius of 10 miles from the original entry. The purpose of this measure is the making of homes through the use and development of a block of land large enough to afford a home for a family in a combination of farming and stock raising. As already intimated, it is not desired to promote speculation or the concentration of such lands in large holdings. A provision permitting the entry of noncontiguous lands would, in my opinion, not be in harmony with this idea, but on the contrary would promote the sale of and speculation in these noncontiguous parcels of land. It is believed that the other sections of the bill are as liberal in the way of additional entries or in the right to surrender lands already held and the making of new entries of the full amount as is advisable.

Since the last session of Congress the department has been seeking information as to the advisability of the passage of such a law as is now proposed by this bill. Attention has been especially directed to the operation of the act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stat., 547), which authorized the entry of not exceeding 640 acres of land in a considerable area of western Nebraska. The provisions of that act as applying to that limited area were, in the main, designed to meet the same conditions which the present bill proposes to meet as to other areas of the public lands. Eleven years have elapsed since the passage of the law relating to western Nebraska, and the investigations of the department as to the results of that legislation are both important and significant. Prior to the passage of the act of 1904, considerable land in western Nebraska had been entered under other laws, but the marvelous development since the passage of the act of 1904 is so marked that it must in great measure at least be attributed to that law. It has been found that some of the valleys and lower lands which intersperse the larger area have been made to produce through intensive cultivation varied crops of large value, and that the production of live stock has largely increased rather than diminished. The improvements placed by the settlers upon their claims indicate both prosperity and permanency of occupation, as dwellings of stone, cement, or frame construction, plastered and provided with conveniences, have generally supplanted the original sod houses, and the farmer who has not built barns, silos, or other structures for storing crops and protecting live stock is a rare exception. The live stock raised upon the small ranches is of a higher grade than that which was produced by grazing upon the vacant public lands.

It appears from statistics collected covering 31 counties within the area to which said law is applicable, that the population was 124,508 in 1890, 107,434 in 1900, and 162,217 in 1910; an increase of nearly 50 per cent in population during said 10-year period, during 6 years of which the 640-acre homestead law was in force.

The value of household furniture increased from $174,779 in 1904 to $342,312 in 1914; an increase of 95 per cent.

The value of agricultural implements in 1904 was $139,609; in 1914, $243,304; increase 74 per cent.

The value of cattle in 1904 was $3,176,109; in 1914, $4,267,055; increase 34 per cent.

Number of acres planted to wheat in 27 counties in 1904, 122,799; in 1914, 297,900; increase 142 per cent.

Number of hogs in 29 counties in 1904, 171,849; in 1914, 225,480; increase 31 per cent.

The acreage of improved land in 27 counties increased 68 per cent in 12 years, 1892 to 1904; increased 77 per cent in 10 years, 1904 to 1914. The value of the improved land decreased 18 per cent the first period and increased 143 per cent the second.

The total assessed valuation of all property in 31 counties in 1892 was $23,468,899.69; in 1904, $27,480,836.57; increase 17 per cent; in 1914, $57,278,766; increase 108 per cent.

Of the land entered in Nebraska under the section law there is an average of 1 settler for every 571 acres. In the 37 counties affected by this law it appears that there are 4,589,870 acres in the hands of the original entrymen, 6,411,963 acres in the hands of small holders, and only 316,453 acres in the hands of what might be termed large holders—that is, those possessing areas in excess of 2,000 acres. The department is informed that the practically unanimous sentiment of the people in western Nebraska is that the law has been a benefit to them and to the country, causing a large increase in the population, promoting the development of the lands, and advancing generally the public welfare.

That a demand for the proposed legislation exists is undoubted not only because existing laws are not adapted to large areas of remaining public lands, but because there is a widespread demand for such legislation in order that additional homes may be made upon the public domain. To secure further data upon the subject, I called upon the various field agents of the General Land Office for information and for an expression of opinion with respect to such legislation. As you are aware, the duties of these agents take them into all parts of the public-land area and they have many and unusual opportunities for observing conditions. The reports generally show the need for some such legislation. The following quotations indicate the view taken by agents on duty in the States mentioned:

MONTANA.

"I believe that the enactment of a law providing for 640-acre homesteads will result in the production of a greater number of cattle than were found on these ranges during the most prosperous days of the cattle kings.

CALIFORNIA.

"After a long experience in the public-land States, it is my belief that at the present time a homestead law allowing a greater acreage than the present 320-acre law would be in order. The land that now remains subject to homestead entry is mostly rough and of doubtful value for agricultural purposes. But give a man enough of it so that he can run a few head of stock and graze a few milch cows and the chances are that he will remain there and make the land his permanent home.

WYOMING.

"A sufficient acreage of these lands should be given the homesteader to insure him a livelihood for his family by putting it to the use to which it is best adapted. The observation of the writer has been that 320 acres of such land is not a sufficient area to support a family by grazing stock, nor is it a unit which can be handled to the best advantage in an economic sense."

NEW MEXICO.

After commenting on the provisions of the enlarged homestead act, which the agent says met with fair success in the northeastern part of the State, he says:

"In the other portions of the State it is not well adapted. Three hundred and twenty acres will not support a family; the productive capacity of the country is not sufficient to maintain a family on each tract of this size. * * *

"The units should be higher; at least 640 acres; with this amount of land some 40 head of cows could be pastured and dairying carried on with the fodder and silage raised and a fair living be assured the homesteader on the 15-inch and better rainfall land, and a poor living on the 10-inch—15-inch rainfall land.

COLORADO.

"Settlement is now pushing west to a different character of land—lands fully as rich and richer for agriculture, but producing naturally a much scantier pasturage—and it requires a larger area for that purpose to support sufficient stock to make the settler a prosperous home and settlement is slower. * * * If the law permitting a homestead on 640 acres is passed, it will tend to build up that section of the country most adapted to grazing, and the land will be put to its best possible use."

As stated at the beginning of the report, the original 160-acre homestead law and the enlarged homestead law permitting the entry of 320 acres have contributed enormously to the agricultural development of the public-land States, and are still being taken advantage of by homeseekers in those localities, where the soil, rainfall, and climate permit the making of homes upon the areas therein described. This measure covers another and different class of lands, extensive in area, to which the existing laws are not suitable, and will, in my opinion, secure the settlement upon and improvement of a very large area of our public-land States, adding materially to the wealth and well-being of the country and providing homes for thousands of citizens who would otherwise be unable to take advantage of the homestead features of our public-land laws. It will wisely supplement existing laws, open a new field, and unquestionably add to the well-being not only of the States wherein the lands are located, but of the entire country.

I recommend that H. R. 407 be enacted as soon as possible.

Cordially, yours,

ANDRIEUS A. JONES,
First Assistant Secretary.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

For the information of those who would care to examine the legislation prior to its being signed by the President and printed in law form, I insert at this point a copy of the engrossed bill for the information of those who want to examine the same critically. It is as follows:

An act (H. R. 407) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated unreserved public land in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as "stock-raising lands."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as stock-raising lands subject to entry under this act lands the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family: Provided, That where any person qualified to make original or additional entry under the provisions of this act shall make application to enter any unappropriated public land which has not been designated as subject to entry (provided said application is accompanied and supported by properly corroborated affidavit of the applicant in duplicate showing prima facie that the land applied for is of the character contemplated by this act), such application, together with the regular fees and commissions, shall be received by the register and receiver of the land district in which said land is located and suspended until it shall have been determined by the Secretary of the Interior whether said land is actually of that character. That during such suspension the land described in the application shall not be disposed of; and if the said land shall be designated under this act, then such application shall be allowed; otherwise it shall be rejected, subject to appeal; but no right to occupy such lands shall be acquired by reason of said application until said lands have been designated as stock-raising lands.

SEC. 3. That any qualified homestead entryman may make entry under the homestead laws of lands so designated by the Secretary of the Interior, according to legal subdivisions, in areas not exceeding 640 acres, and in compact form so far as may be subject to the provisions of this act, and secure title thereto by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws: Provided, That a former homestead entry of land of the character described in section 2 hereof shall not be a bar to the entry of a tract within a radius of 20 miles from such former entry under the provisions of this act, subject to the requirements of law as to residence and improvements, which, together with the former entry, shall not exceed 640 acres: Provided further, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land: Provided further, That instead of cultivation as required by the homestead laws the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the land entered before final proof is submitted tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and at least one-half of such improvements shall be placed upon the land within three years after the date of entry thereof.

SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described, who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry, shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such amount of contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but improvements must be made on the additional entry equal to $1.25 for each acre thereof.

SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof upon, or received patent for, lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws, and who own and reside upon the land so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead law, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of the expenditure required by this act on account of permanent improvements upon the additional entry.

SEC. 6. That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States, who has entered or acquired under the homestead laws, prior to the passage of this act, lands of the character described in this act, the area of which is less than 640 acres, and who is unable to exercise the right of additional entry herein conferred because no lands subject to entry under this act adjoin the tract so entered or acquired or lie within the 20-mile limit provided for in this act, may, upon submitting proof that he resides upon and has not sold the land so entered or acquired and against which land there are no encumbrances, relinquish or reconvey to the United States the land so occupied, entered, or acquired, and in lieu thereof, within the same land-office district, may enter and acquire title to 640 acres of the land subject to entry under this act, but must show compliance with all the provisions of this act respecting the new entry and with all the provisions of existing homestead laws except as modified herein.

SEC. 7. That the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to any entries made under this act.

SEC. 8. That any homestead entrymen or patentees who shall be entitled to additional entry under this act shall have for 90 days after the designation of lands subject to entry under the provisions of this act and contiguous to those entered or owned and occupied by him the preferential right to make additional entry as provided in this act: Provided, That where such lands contiguous to the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to additional entries under this section are not sufficient in area to enable such entrymen to secure by additional entry the maximum amounts to which they are entitled, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make an equitable division of the lands among the several entrymen or patentees, applying to exercise preferential rights, such division to be in tracts of not less than 40 acres, or other legal subdivision, and so made as to equalize as nearly as possible the area which such entrymen and patentees will acquire by adding the tracts embraced in additional entries to the lands originally held or owned by them: Provided further, That where but one such tract of vacant land may adjoin the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to exercise preferential right hereunder, the tract in question may be entered by the person who first submits to the local land office his application to exercise said preferential right.

SEC. 9. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other mineral deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal and mineral land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter the coal or other mineral deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal or other mineral therein, provided he shall not injure, damage, or destroy the permanent improvements of the entryman or patentee, and shall be liable to and shall compensate the entryman or patentee for all damages to the crops on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal or other mineral deposits in any such land, or the right to mine and remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining or removal of the coal or other minerals, first, upon securing the written consent or waiver of the homestead entryman or patentee; second, upon payment of the damages to crops or other tangible improvements to the owner thereof, where agreement may be had as to the amount thereof; or, third, in lieu of either of the foregoing provisions, upon the execution of a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to the United States for the use and benefit of the entryman or owner of the land, to secure the payment of such damages to the crops or tangible improvements of the entryman or owner, as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond or undertaking in a court of competent jurisdiction against the principal and sureties thereon, such bond or undertaking to be in form and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be filed with and approved by the register and receiver of the local land office of the district wherein the land is situate, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That all patents issued for the coal or other mineral deposits herein reserved shall contain appropriate notations declaring them to be subject to the provisions of this act with reference to the disposition, occupancy, and use of the land as permitted to an entryman under this act.

SEC. 10. That lands containing water holes or other bodies of water needed or used by the public for watering purposes shall not be designated under this act but may be reserved under the provisions of the act of June 25, 1910, and such lands heretofore or hereafter reserved shall, while so reserved, be kept and held open to the public use for such purposes under such general rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary may, in his discretion, also withdraw from entry lands necessary to insure access by the public to watering places reserved hereunder and needed for use in the movement of stock to summer and winter ranges or to shipping points, and may prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the proper administration and use of such lands: Provided further, That such driveways shall not be of greater number or width than shall be clearly necessary for the purpose proposed and in no event shall be more than 1 mile in width for a driveway less than 20 miles in length, not more than 2 miles in width for driveways over 20 and not more than 35 miles in length and not over 5 miles in width for driveways over 35 miles in length: Provided further, That all stock so transported over such driveways shall be moved an average of not less than 3 miles per day for sheep and goats and an average of not less than 6 miles per day for cattle and horses.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions and purposes of this act for the purpose of carrying the same into effect.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I want merely to supplement what the chairman of the committee said in his explanation of the procedure required in order to secure the benefits of this act. I do not believe he fully stated the situation. He said that anybody might make an application to enter this land, and then the application would be suspended while agents would be sent to the land to determine its character and ascertain if it fell within this particular classification. I think the gentleman will agree with me that that will be done only in an exceptional case. In the vast majority of these cases it is the intention of the bill that the Secretary of the Interior will in the first instance designate without application the lands that may be entered under the provisions of this act.

I want to say further, inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] wishes this information, that I hope the people of Philadelphia and of the East will not assume that merely because of the passage of this law they can get 640 acres of land and make a living upon it—upon land that has not been previously designated by the Secretary of the Interior. And I further hope that the Secretary of the Interior in the administration of this law will not designate lands that are not such as in his judgment would enable the settler to support a family upon 640 acres.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's statement raises a further question that calls for explanation. Does it mean now that the man in the East who would like to take up this land would be taking up land that is worthless? Would he be deceived as to its character and lose whatever outlay he might make in transportation and living expenses?

Mr. LENROOT. That might be possible if he relied upon advertisements and efforts of locaters in the West to get him out there on the assumption that he is going to get 640 acres of good land. In that case he would very likely be mistaken. It would be better for him to rely upon the designation first made by the Secretary of the Interior, and then it would be well for him to make inquiries as to the land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. While the gentleman is on his feet, may I ask him whether actual occupancy is required in order to obtain this land?

Mr. LENROOT. It is. I would like to say a word in further response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Actual occupancy and improvements are required, as under the general homestead law; but in lieu of the cultivation required by the general homestead law, improvements for stock-raising purposes to the extent of $1.25 an acre only are required.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, responding first to the inquiry of the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania] I would say that some of those who have been most interested in the passage of this act are people of his city; and I have before me the articles of agreement which are, I understand, to be entered into by a considerable number of the people of Philadelphia, under which, in a cooperative way, they hope to be able to establish homes on some of the land which will be opened under this law in Wyoming. Several of the citizens of his city, one of whom was here yesterday, have already been over the land, and in some cases have made the 320-acre entries, and have determined upon the land which they hope to be able to file upon under the law.

Replying to his further inquiry, as to whether people generally have full and definite information with regard to the lands open to entry under the land laws, I want to say that it is unfortunate, I think, that what information is obtainable is not in many instances of a character that is really useful to a man who is not generally familiar with the western country. Much of the information would be entirely available and useful to farmers in the western trans-Mississippi States, because those farmers understand the technology and the descriptions and locations, and are accustomed to going over public land. But men living farther east, who are not accustomed to that sort of thing and do not know the country and are not familiar with the means of transportation and what is necessary to locate land, are unfortunately not as well supplied with information as they should be, and they never have been. Something ought to be done in that direction. However, the man from the East who is sincerely anxious to acquire a home on these lands in the West, and who is willing to take the same chance that people have taken in the past, to go out and look the land over, may have, and does have, just as good an opportunity as anyone else has to make an entry.

Mr. Chairman, speaking in general of this legislation I want to say that the people of the western and semiarid country have looked forward for a number of years with hopeful expectation toward the passage of legislation which would enlarge the area of the homestead, covering lands which are not of certain value under cultivation, but which are primarily of value for grazing purposes. We hope, of course, that all of the settlers on these lands will make an attempt in some way to cultivate a portion of their land, but the major portion of the land which will be enterable under this law will be land where the dependence must be in the main upon stock raising. I am very much interested in this matter, because I think I first brought to the attention of the House the question of the evolution of the homestead law along these lines, and a number of years ago I introduced the first bill providing for a stock-raising or grazing homestead of 640 to 1,280 acres. I certainly have not any disposition to criticize this bill because of the fact that it is in many essential respects different from the bill that I introduced, but I believe it would not be fair to the western people and to the people of the country generally who are expected to benefit by this legislation if a brief statement were not made as to the character of the legislation, compared with the expectation of those who have advocated it and of the people in the section to which it applies.

It is quite a remarkable and unusual thing that, from the standpoint of all interested parties, this bill as presented to us by the conferees is not as satisfactory as either the House bill or the Senate bill. This is a very unusual situation, unfortunately brought about largely, I understand, by influences outside of Congress. In other words, there were rumors and suggestions that unless the bill was modified in some essential respects as it had been agreed upon by both Houses it would not become a law. Influenced to some extent, at least, I understand, by those rumors and considerations, the conferees, outside of their authority, felt called upon to make some amendments to the bill, to eliminate from it certain matters upon which both Houses had agreed, and add to it matter which was not and is not properly in conference. I certainly shall not make the point of order on that action of the conference committee, and I hope no one else will, for while I regret it I realize that the bill as presented is the best that can be secured at this time. Yet it is a fact which should be understood, I think, before the bill passes this House that the action of the conferees renders the bill, which was not very satisfactory as it passed the House and was not entirely satisfactory as it passed the Senate, still less satisfactory now than it was either as it passed the House or as it passed the Senate.

In the first place, I think the fact should be emphasized that the bill establishes a new method and theory with regard to minerals in the land legislation in our country. It reverts back to the ancient doctrine of the ownership of the mineral by the king or the crown and reserves specifically everything that is mineral in all the land entered. It was, it was claimed, necessary to accept a provision of that kind in order to secure the larger acreage. The Interior Department insisted upon it, and many supported that view. My own opinion is that that policy is not wise and that in the long run it will be found to be infinitely more harmful than beneficial or useful or helpful to anyone, either the individual or the public generally. When one takes into consideration the wide range of substances classed as mineral, the actual ownership under a complete mineral reservation becomes a doubful question.

The bill as it passed the House contained a number of sections assuming to give those already on the ground as homestead settlers, who held lands somewhat similar to those described in the bill, an opportunity to take additional areas, either contiguous to their lands or at some distance from them, and also a provision under which a purchase could be made in certain cases. Unfortunately, the language of the House bill was so restricted in character that it was very doubtful whether any considerable number of those now holding homestead entries on the public domain could avail themselves of the privileges and the opportunities assumed to be extended by those sections.

In the Senate those sections were liberalized so as to make it quite clear and definite that a very considerable number and character of people now holding public land could avail themselves of the opportunity to secure additional entries. But in conference the Senate receded from all of those liberalizing provisions, and there was a demand from certain quarters that, in addition to that, a right of application before designation contained in section 2 should be stricken from the bill. Instead of doing that, however, the conferees inserted an amendment, out of order, or beyond their authority, under which the rights of those exercising this advance or preferential privilege were largely restricted. That restriction, in my opinion, is not wise and will be unfortunate and hampering to the entrymen. It is, however, much better than striking out the preferential proviso. We could not and would not have stood for that.

There is also a provision for driveways, which, in my opinion, is not entirely what it should be, particularly as affected by the amendment to the proviso to section 2. We have, as I have pointed out, this bill as it comes from conference less satisfactory than as either body passed it, and, I fear, not very satisfactory either to those who now occupy lands in this region or to those who may come in the future to make homes upon them. It seems, however, to be the best that we can get under the circumstances, and so we accept it, not because it is perfect, by any manner of means, not because it is satisfactory, by any manner of means, but because it does give certain opportunities for further development.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Did I understand the gentleman from Wyoming to say that the conferees put new matter into this bill that was not in controversy between the two Houses?

Mr. MONDELL. A section was stricken from the bill in regard to which there was but one small and unimportant amendment, and my notion would be that the conferees exceeded their authority in doing that, and also in adding a few lines to a certain section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming two minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the conferees did the very best they could. I do not intend to criticize the conferees—certainly not the House conferees. My criticism of the bill is not aimed at the House conferees at all. I believe they did the very best they could under the circumstances, and I believe the conference report ought to be accepted because of that fact. I simply called attention to the fact that conditions were such that we could not get all that the conferees would be glad to secure.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Is it possible for any family to get a living out of 640 acres in raising cattle?

Mr. MONDELL. There are lands in the Western States made subject to entry under this law upon which a family can make a good living on 640 acres. To do that in most cases it will be necessary to cultivate some crops, and that can be done on a portion of almost any entry that would be justified under this law. There are, of course, vast areas where one could not make a living for a family on 640 acres. Such land should not be entered.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question.

Mr. FERRIS. Very well.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, as one of the conferees, he inserted anything in the report that was not in controversy between the two Houses?

Mr. FERRIS. Technically, I rather think we did; but let me qualify that. The three questions at issue all through the different Senate amendments and which occurred in almost every paragraph were, first, the method of initiating the entry; and, second, the method of making an additional entry; and the third was the method of making residence proof of the claim and the character of the land. In order to harmonize these differences we added to section 2, that was not changed or amended by either body, a paragraph which was acceptable to all parties concerned, harmonizing the differences in the other paragraphs that were changed. I think that in so doing, technically, we exceeded our authority, but literally we did not. As I say, on the second section we put in a proviso which I think was in the direction that the gentleman from Illinois would like to go. It was to prevent speculation. It was to aid in adiministration. It was necessary to do justice and get an agreement all around.

Mr. MADDEN. The intention was to harmonize the different sections, and that was the purpose?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; all through the bill. There was a provision in one of the Senate amendments that the settlers should not necessarily reside on it, and I would not consent to that, because that ceased to make it a homestead and invited speculation. The other proposition embodied in one of the Senate amendments allowing the homesteader to buy additional land we thought would lead to speculation and we struck that out, but we did it to harmonize the whole bill and get an agreement.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman is familiar with the public lands of the West and the acreage and the climate?

Mr. FERRIS. I try to be. I study it a good deal in my committee work.

Mr. EMERSON. Would it be possible to set aside any public lands where there is a proper climate that would be suitable for persons suffering from tubercular trouble?

Mr. FERRIS. I think Arizona or Colorado would be the better place.

Mr. EMERSON. Is there public land which could be set aside for that purpose?

Mr. FERRIS. There are large areas in both States I have named. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this 640-acre stock-raising homestead bill, as most of the membership of this House know, has been before Congress for the past three years, and several of us have been diligently working for it during all of that time. I introduced the bill in the Sixty-third Congress and reintroduced it on the first day of this Sixty-fourth Congress, so that the question of the advisability of providing for stock-raising homesteads is not a new subject before Congress.

This bill represents a natural evolution or adaptation of the homestead laws to conditions existing in the public-land States. There are to-day over 250,000,000 acres of unappropriated and unreserved public lands in the United States. This land has been traveled over for 50 years and has not thus far been deemed of sufficient productivity to afford a living for a man and his family upon 160 acres; and since the 19th of February, 1909, the 320-acre enlarged homestead law has been applicable to nearly all of it, and yet it is not taken up.

Land hunger in the United States—that is, the desire and hope to obtain a home, which is one of the noblest instincts of the human race—is greater to-day than ever before. Yet, it is not only folly but almost criminal to invite men with families to go onto a quantity of land that is not sufficient for them to make a living upon. And many of us from the West have for several years felt that the time had come when a new form of homestead law should be enacted to make the settlement a part of those vast areas possible.

This bill will apply to large portions of arid mesas, mountain sides, as well as gulches and rough, broken land, where, by the dry-farming methods and by using crops suitable to the arid regions, a settler can, by acquiring a few head of stock, maintain a home and support himself and family.

There have been some objections to this measure by representatives of large cattle and sheep growers, upon the ground that the bill may interfere with the use of the open public range. On the other hand, some people object to the measure because it is not liberal enough. All of those objections and recommendations have been exhaustively considered, and this bill is a compromise and the best compromise that can be obtained. It does not go as far as I think it might safely go, and there are some restrictions that I think are unnecessary. But it is a long, long and tremendously important step in the right direction. In fact, it marks a very important epoch in the public-land legislation of this country, more even than the passage of the enlarged homestead law, or the enactment of the three-year homestead law, with which I was actively connected. It is true that this bill is not as liberal as either the Senate or House bill; at the same time, if conditions warrant it, Congress can hereafter amend the law, and I feel that we should by all means adopt this report, and I trust the President will approve the measure and that it will be given a fair trial.

The Senate amendment concerning driveways for stock your conferees felt was entirely too broad. While we do not doubt the wisdom of the Interior Department, at the same time we felt that Congress ought to formally express a disapproval of a provision with no limitation, which provides for the withdrawal of land for driveways. I very seriously protested to the Secretary of the Interior and to the conference committee about that Senate provision, and I guess I am not violating any confidence when I say that the last two provisos on that subject were offered by myself and agreed to in conference as an expression of the very emphatic sentiment of your conference committee and the two Public Lands Committees of the Senate and House against this bill being used by the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of Agriculture as a general or unreasonable withdrawal bill. While we fully realize the necessity for reasonable and actual driveways, at the same time we do not want that necessity to be used as an excuse for creating great grazing zones, nor any unreasonable and unnecessary withdrawal of lands that will provide homes.

I feel that the State of Colorado will be benefited enormously by this measure, and I think my congressional district will probably be benefited as much, if not more, than any other district in the entire West by the enactment of this law.

It takes homes to make permanent taxpayers and bring schools and build cities and towns and roads. Lands all over the West that were looked upon as utterly worthless 10 and even 5 years ago are to-day good homes, and in many places there are prosperous cities on former cattle ranges. No one now has sufficient knowledge or foresight to classify our public domain. The people are classifying it every day. The time will probably sometime come when homesteading will practically cease, and there will ultimately, undoubtedly, be some large bodies of land that can not be used for homes, but that time is a long way off yet.

In the State of Colorado, of which I have the honor in part to represent, there are to-day nearly 15,000,000 acres of unappropriated and unreserved public domain outside of the forest reserves, and there are 14,339,994 acres in the forest reserves of Colorado, besides other withdrawals. This law will mean the settlement of, I believe, approximately one-fourth of all the remaining public domain outside of the forest reserves of the United States, and will add thousands of homes to each of the Western States and put several million acres of land that now appears almost utterly worthless into a productive condition and onto the tax rolls of each of those States.

Before closing, I want to say a kindly word about our former colleague, Congressman Fergusson, of New Mexico, since deceased. He devoted an immense amount of time, energy, and painstaking service to the preparation and support of this bill. His whole heart was in the measure, and among us friends of his on the Public Lands Committee, there is a feeling of sadness that he could not have lived to see the enactment of this law. But his State and the entire West will be greatly benefited by his labor in its behalf.

In order that the record may be correct and that the public may have the benefit of seeing this bill before it is issued by the Government Printing Office as a law, which usually takes some little time, I am going to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a copy of the bill identically as we agreed upon it in conference and as the law will be, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated unreserved public land in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as "stock-raising lands."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as stock-raising lands subject to entry under this act lands the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family: Provided, That where any person qualified to make original or additional entry under the provisions of this act shall make application to enter any unappropriated public land which has not been designated as subject to entry (provided said application is accompanied and supported by properly corroborated affidavit of the applicant, in duplicate, showing prima facie that the land applied for is of the character contemplated by this act), such application, together with the regular fees and commissions, shall be received by the register and receiver of the land district in which said land is located and suspended until it shall have been determined by the Secretary of the Interior whether said land is actually of that character. That during such suspension the land described in the application shall not be disposed of; and if the said land shall be designated under this act, then such application shall be allowed; otherwise it shall be rejected, subject to appeal, but no right to occupy such lands shall be acquired by reason of said application until said lands have been designated as stock-raising lands.

SEC. 3. That any qualified homestead entryman may make entry under the homestead laws of lands so designated by the Secretary of the Interior, according to legal subdivisions, in areas not exceeding 640 acres, and in compact form so far as may be subject to the provisions of this act, and secure title thereto by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws: Provided, That a former homestead entry of land of the character described in section 2 hereof shall not be a bar to the entry of a tract within a radius of 20 miles from such former entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the former entry, shall not exceed 640 acres: Provided further, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land: Provided further, That instead of cultivation as required by the homestead laws the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the land entered before final proof is submitted tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and at least one-half of such improvements shall be placed upon the land within three years after the date of entry thereof.

SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman, who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry, shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such amount of contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but improvements must be made on the additional entry equal to $1.25 for each acre thereof.

SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof upon, or received patent for, lands under the homestead laws, and who own and reside upon the land so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead law, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of the expenditure required by this act on account of permanent improvements upon the additional entry.

SEC. 6. That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States, who has entered or acquired under the homestead laws, prior to the passage of this act, lands of the character described in this act, the area of which is less than 640 acres, and who is unable to exercise the right of additional entry herein conferred because no lands subject to entry under this act adjoin the tract so entered or acquired or lie within the 20-mile limit provided for in this act, may, upon submitting proof that he resides upon and has not sold the land so entered or acquired and against which land there are no encumbrances, relinquish or reconvey to the United States the land so occupied, entered, or acquired, and in lieu thereof, within the same land-office district, may enter and acquire title to 640 acres of the land subject to entry under this act, but must show compliance with all the provisions of this act respecting the new entry and with all the provisions of existing homestead laws except as modified herein.

SEC. 7. That the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to any entries made under this act.

SEC. 8. That any homestead entrymen or patentees who shall be entitled to additional entry under this act shall have, for 90 days after the designation of lands subject to entry under the provisions of this act and contiguous to those entered or owned and occupied by him, the preferential right to make additional entry as provided in this act: Provided, That where such lands contiguous to the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to additional entries under this section are not sufficient in area to enable such entrymen to secure by additional entry the maximum amounts to which they are entitled, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make an equitable division of the lands among the several entrymen or patentees applying to exercise preferential rights, such division to be in tracts of not less than 40 acres, or other legal subdivision, and so made as to equalize as nearly as possible the area which such entrymen and patentees will acquire by adding the tracts embraced in additional entries to the lands originally held or owned by them: Provided further, That where but one such tract of vacant land may adjoin the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to exercise preferential right hereunder, the tract in question may be entered by the person who first submits to the local land office his application to exercise said preferential right.

SEC. 10. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other mineral deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal and mineral land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter the coal or other mineral deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal or other mineral therein, provided he shall not injure, damage, or destroy the permanent improvements of the entryman or patentee, and shall be liable to and shall compensate the entryman or patentee for all damages to the crops on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal or other mineral deposits in any such land, or the right to mine and remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining or removal of the coal or other minerals, first, upon securing the written consent or waiver of the homestead entryman or patentee; second, upon payment of the damages to crops or other tangible improvements to the owner thereof, where agreement may be had as to the amount thereof; or, third, in lieu of either of the foregoing provisions, upon the execution of a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to the United States for the use and benefit of the entryman or owner of the land, to secure the payment of such damages to the crops or tangible improvements of the entryman or owner, as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond or undertaking in a court of competent jurisdiction against the principal and sureties thereon, such bond or undertaking to be in form and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and to be filed with and approved by the register and receiver of the local land office of the district wherein the land is situate, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That all patents issued for the coal or other mineral deposits herein reserved shall contain appropriate notations declaring them to be subject to the provisions of this act with reference to the disposition, occupancy, and use of the land as permitted to an entryman under this act.

SEC. 11. That lands containing water holes or other bodies of water needed or used by the public for watering purposes shall not be designated under this act, but may be reserved under the provisions of the act of June 25, 1910, and such lands heretofore or hereafter reserved shall, while so reserved, be kept and held open to the public use for such purposes under such general rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary may, in his discretion, also withdraw from entry lands necessary to insure access by the public to watering places reserved hereunder and needed for use in the movement of stock to summer and winter ranges or to shipping points, and may prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the proper administration and use of such lands: Provided further, That such driveways shall not be of greater number or width than shall be clearly necessary for the purpose proposed and in no event shall be more than 1 mile in width for a driveway less than 20 miles in length, not more than 2 miles in width for driveways over 20 and not more than 35 miles in length, and not over 5 miles in width for driveways over 35 miles in length: Provided further, That all stock so transported over such driveways shall be moved an average of not less than 3 miles per day for sheep and goats and an average of not less than 6 miles per day for cattle and horses.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions and purposes of this act for the purpose of carrying the same into effect.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 407. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 306. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of the deferred installments due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 19178. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 407. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing two letters and a statement from The Adjutant General relative to the amount of the receipts and disbursements during our occupancy at Vera Cruz.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether his statement shows what became of the million dollars that was collected at Vera Cruz during the American occupation?

Mr. DILLON. I will say to the gentleman that the letter is dated September 20, and shows that the amount of money deposited at New Orleans in the Subtreasury was $2,604,051.20 in Mexican money. I telephoned this morning to the office of The Adjutant General and was advised that that money still remained in the Subtreasury at New Orleans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DIVERSION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 186, authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River, and to consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 186. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have received a good many telegrams from business men in my district urging immediate and favorable consideration of this resolution. As I understand it, it involves further drain on the Niagara River for water-power purposes in New York State. Is that the purpose of it?

Mr. FLOOD. The purpose of this resolution is to authorize the Secretary of War to issue permits for 20,000 cubic feet per second of water to be taken from the Niagara River above the Falls until the 4th day of March, by which time we hope to enact permanent legislation to control and regulate the taking and using of this water.

Mr. BORLAND. The fact that it requires legislation indicates that the Secretary of War has not now the power to issue those permits.

Mr. FLOOD. He has not. The law which gave the Secretary of War such power has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. We are enlarging his power to issue permits to take water out of the river?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the situation is that the water that is being taken from the Niagara River now by the power companies is being taken without any legal authority. Heretofore there has been a law known as the Burton law, which expired on the 4th of March, 1913, authorizing the diversion of 15,600 cubic feet per second of the water which the United States under the treaty was authorized to grant permits for; but that law has expired by limitation. The companies, however, have gone on, and no one has raised an objection to their taking the 15,600 cubic feet. Some time last year the former Secretary of War, probably putting a different construction upon the law from what the present Secretary does, authorized an additional diversion of, I think, twelve or fifteen hundred cubic feet, and this permit was extended by the present Secretary. That has also been diverted, but no more of the 4,400 feet is being diverted.

The purpose of this resolution as we propose to amend it is to authorize the diversion by the power companies with machinery installed for the purpose of generating power of the entire 20,000 cubic feet per second that under the treaty with Great Britain this country has the right to authorize to be diverted for a period from now until the 4th of next March.

Mr. BORLAND. As a matter of principle I am opposed to taking any more water out of Niagara Falls; but, as I understand it, we have a treaty with Canada giving her a right to take a certain amount of water on the Canadian side, and we are taking a certain amount of water upon our side. I would like to have the gentleman explain whether we have yet reached the limit or whether by this resolution we will reach the limit that is now being used by Canada?

Mr. FLOOD. We can not reach the limit. The treaty authorizes Canada to permit a diversion of 36,000 cubic feet per second and authorizes the United States to permit the diversion of 20,000 feet per second, so that Canada has 16,000 cubic feet per second more than we have.

Mr. BORLAND. This resolution authorizes permits to be issued up to the full 20,000 feet per second?

Mr. FLOOD. It does, but the resolution also provides that permits shall not be issued to any companies that have not now the machinery installed to use the water, and the two companies there that will take the water have the machinery installed that will use the 15,600 cubic feet and probably 3,700 cubic feet of the remaining 4,400 cubic feet.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman this question. Something has been said about Canada having placed an embargo upon the transmission of power into this country. Is that a new proposition, or has not that always been the case, that she refused to permit hydroelectric power to be used except in Canada?

Mr. FLOOD. No; that is a very recent development. The companies that generated power in Canada sold a greater portion of that power in this country, but the Canadian Government reserved the right to require them to cancel their contracts at any time it saw fit. For instance, one company that is a sister company of an American company was exporting 75,000 horsepower to this country. The Canadian Government has recently required them to cut that down to 30,000 horsepower under the contract which the Canadian Government made with that company. It had the right to do that, and instead of 75,000 horsepower coming from that company into this country, only 30,000 is being imported at this time. Another company that was importing 80,000 horsepower into this country has been cut down to 60,000 horsepower. These reductions—and there are others—create a great shortage of power in that community.

Mr. BORLAND. Is that a complete embargo against the transmission of power?

Mr. FLOOD. It is not an embargo at all. The Canadians need the power and they are exercising the right which they reserved in their contract with these companies, to require them to permit the power to be used in Canada instead of the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Was it contemplated when we made that treaty giving Canada 36,000 cubic feet and the United States 20,000 cubic feet that we were going to use in this country a part of that power generated in Canada?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think so. I think that might have been the expectation of citizens of America, because they did not think the Canadians would use that much power, and at first they did not need it. But as a result of the European war there has been large industries built up there for the manufacture of munitions of war and other purposes, and they need the power and they need it right now, and the claim is that they have the right to it, as they have.

Mr. BORLAND. Have they a perfect right under their treaty to place any embargo on the transmission of power?

Mr. FLOOD. They have a perfect right under their treaty to require all the power generated from 36,000 cubic feet per second from Niagara River to be used in Canada.

Mr. BORLAND. As I stated a moment ago, I am quite opposed to further inroads upon Niagara River and Niagara Falls.

Mr. FLOOD. I think the gentleman's objection there will be met by this suggestion. This resolution, as the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported it, limits the permits to the 4th of March. There can not be a reasonable objection to taking water from the Niagara Falls during the winter months when there is a tremendous flow of water——

Mr. BORLAND. No; there can not be——

Mr. FLOOD (continuing). And when the scenic beauty of the Falls could not be affected.

Mr. BORLAND. No; there can not be. As I understand the gentleman, it is not contemplated to permit the right to any tremendous increase of their plants or to make any permanent investments there which we will afterwards be required to protect in any way by giving them a continuous permit.

Mr. FLOOD. That is provided for in the resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. The resolution does not permit the enlarging of their plants or for any new plants to be created.

Mr. FLOOD. That is right.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What is the date of the expiration of our treaty with Canada?

Mr. FLOOD. No date is fixed. It can only be terminated by notice.

Mr. WINGO. It is one of those treaties where notice must be given?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I thought I noticed some time ago that this question had been reopened between the two countries. Is that true?

Mr. FLOOD. What was the gentleman's statement?

Mr. WINGO. Has there not been some discussion in a diplomatic way between the two countries over this question in the last few years?

Mr. FLOOD. There has not been.

Mr. WINGO. What is the object of limiting these permits to the 4th of March?

Mr. FLOOD. Well, there are a great many reasons and one is that this is a mere temporary resolution to meet an emergency in the power famine in that section of the country. There is a bill pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which will probably be reported out the early part of next year, which deals comprehensively with all questions of the use of the water from the Niagara River.

Mr. WINGO. It is the intention of the committee to take up the question and present a bill dealing with the matter on a permanent basis?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; to deal with it permanently.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say I would be rather inclined to oppose any further encroachments upon the water of Niagara Falls, and I wanted to ask whether this resolution would set a precedent by which we would be committed to further legislation of this character?

Mr. FLOOD. I should not think so. This is to relieve a temporary situation. There has been this tremendous withdrawal of power from the manufacturers of this country by the Canadian generators of power within the last two months or six weeks, or even within the last two weeks.

Mr. FESS. I understand this treaty limits the amount to be used by both sides?

Mr. FLOOD. It does.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman any estimate as to what will be the lowering of the water by this amount of additional water used?

Mr. FLOOD. Well, that is a disputed question. Some gentlemen contend that it will not lower it at all. I think Gen. Bixby testified before the committee two or three years ago that the effect on the beauty of the Falls depended largely upon the lowering of the water from 5 to 10 inches. Gen. Bixby thought it would be probably 5 or not more than 9 inches.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does not that 5 or 10 inches include allowing 20,000 cubic feet to this side and 30,000 to the other side? But the 4,400 cubic feet, it is estimated, would lower the Falls farther only three-fifths of an inch.

Mr. FLOOD. I am not quite certain about that.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if in the discussion of this resolution before the Senate the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] did not make the statement that he had called up the officials of the War Department and they stated that these permits would not interfere with the amount of water or navigation or scenic beauty?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know what took place in the Senate. I know the Secretary of War was before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in advocacy of this resolution, which was drawn by the War Department. He stated that, in his opinion, it would have no effect on the scenic beauty, but rather believed it would be helpful.

Mr. FESS. May I ask the chairman whether he has any information that this might be a beginning that would lead to a destruction of the scenic beauty of this great natural wonder?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a very careful investigation of this question. Most of them have been on the ground and they have reached the conclusion, I believe I speak correctly, that the diversion of this 56,000 cubic feet of water a second will not affect the scenic beauty of the falls.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Are the Canadians using their 36,000?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think they are now; but they are preparing to use all of it. They are using part of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Before the gentleman calls for a vote, can I get five minutes?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In what way does this resolution differ from H. R. 8038?

Mr. FLOOD. This is a mere temporary resolution giving authority to the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits. The bill the gentleman refers to deals with the whole question and provides for the permanent use of this water, and involves such questions as what the Government should charge for it and the regulation of it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. This bill only provides for the issue of these permits until March?

Mr. FLOOD. The resolution as it passed the Senate was for the 1st of July. The House committee recommended the 4th of March. They cut it down to that date.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this permit carry with it the entire amount that can be diverted under the treaty?

Mr. FLOOD. It does; but, as I stated just now, it will not be possible to use all the water diverted under the restrictions of this resolution.

Mr. RAINEY. That is, the intention is to have this permit expire on the 4th of March?

Mr. FLOOD. On the 4th of March.

Mr. RAINEY. And to have this diversion stop at that time?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. The Secretary of War is having some trouble in enforcing a permit of that kind at the other end of the Lakes, and the matter is now pending in the courts as to whether he can do it or not.

Mr. FLOOD. He has never had any trouble at Niagara Falls. I think the companies there have complied with every demand the War Department has ever made on them. They are probably using water now they have no legal right to use, but there has been no suggestion that they stop using it.

Mr. RAINEY. Does this resolution provide in any way for compensation of the Government?

Mr. FLOOD. It does not. It is a mere temporary resolution, and we did not think we could get it through if we brought that question into it. The Cline bill, that is pending in the committee and will be reported soon, will deal with that question.

Mr. RAINEY. With so many gentlemen absent to-day, and it being such an important question, involving the principle of compensation, does the gentleman think this is a proper time to follow it?

Mr. FLOOD. I did not know so many gentlemen were going to be absent, but it is the first time except yesterday afternoon that we have had an opportunity to call it up. It is a matter of great importance to the power companies at Niagara Falls and to manufacturers not only at Niagara Falls, but all over the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. I presume that is true.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not equally important there that the municipalities have light?

Mr. FLOOD. I presume some of the municipalities will suffer for want of sufficient light.

Mr. RAINEY. I think if the gentleman will permit this to be called on the first day after the holidays I shall not object.

Mr. FLOOD. That will be 10 days, and men will be thrown out of work all over the country. It is therefore very important that we proceed to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that the withdrawal of this power by Canada has resulted in serious interference with certain manufacturing concerns. Arrangements are now under way to supply this withdrawn power from plants that will be operated as other plants are. The purpose of this is to tide over the period in which these other plants may be developed. And that was the reason the Senate fixed the time until the 30th of June, so that these plants might be completed, equipped, and utilized.

Mr. RAINEY. I will ask the gentleman to call it up later in the day, after I shall have had an opportunity to look into the hearings and to see what the question involved is.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that this is an amended resolution.

Mr. SMITH of New York. And it has to go back to the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD. It has to go back to the Senate. I just moved to take this resolution from the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. Ask the Speaker to lay the Senate resolution before the House.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; if there is any objection to unanimous consent.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman that there is no quorum present to take that up. I ask the gentleman to let this matter rest for an hour or so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Before the gentleman does that, I wish he would yield me a minute or two. I wish to make a statement concerning it.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to make this statement now because I shall be compelled to be absent when the bill comes up later in the day. I do not wish to have it go unchallenged that the United States has an unquestioned right to control or dispose of the water of the Niagara River, or to impose any charge for the use of water diverted for commercial purposes. The only right the United States has is to regulate the control of the water in so far as it may affect the navigation of the Niagara River. No one assumes that the purpose of regulating this flow has anything to do with navigation. Half the bed of this river and half the volume of the water of the Niagara River belongs to the State of New York, and if the right to impose a charge for the use of the water is lodged anywhere it is in the State of New York. In my opinion there is very grave doubt whether the United States has any right whatever to regulate the amount of water that shall be taken from the river. I am in sympathy, however, with those who desire to protect the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls, that great wonder of the world; but I shall not sit here representing the State of New York and have it asserted without any dissent whatever that the Federal Government has rights that it did not possess when the State of New York came into the Union, and which the State of New York has never surrendered to the United States. I have never found any satisfactory authority that justifies any claim upon the part of the United States Government to the rights that it has asserted in this matter.

The hydroelectric power that heretofore has been brought into the United States from Canada and has been utilized to operate certain manufacturing establishments in this country has been withdrawn. Those companies are now suffering because of inability to obtain power. It is realized that it would be impossible hereafter to obtain the same amount of power from Canada as heretofore. Arrangements are under way to erect power plants where the power will be generated other than by water power, so as to supply the needs of those manufacturing establishments that heretofore were supplied from Canada. The purpose of this resolution is to tide over the period during which it will be necessary to obtain those new plants.

Every one realizes that the water withdrawn under this resolution will not affect the scenic beauty of the Falls; that it is only to be temporary; and that it is a desirable thing to do. But beyond that I wish it to be understood that there are some who seriously doubt the right of the United States to exercise any authority whatever over the subject.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be recognized a moment or two, to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Speaker, that we will have the resolution up again this afternoon.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like briefly to reply now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, the views as to the authority of a State over the waters of a navigable stream, which have just been expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], were enunciated a long time ago in that State. I refer to a remarkable decision, embodying in principle that view, made by the famous Justice Kent, of the New York Court of Appeals, in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden. Gentlemen will remember that the Legislature of the State of New York had given the exclusive privilege to Livingston and Fulton to use steamboats in the navigable waters of the State of New York; that litigation arose and that when the case was heard in the highest court of the State the chief justice of that court, James Kent, the author of the famous work, "Kent's Commentaries on American Law," declared, in an elaborate opinion, what the distinguished gentleman from New York has now said, that the authority to control the waters of a navigable stream in the State of New York was in the legislature of the State.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin does not think I am making a statement that is identical with the contention in that case. What I said was entirely different, and nobody who listened to me could possibly misunderstand it unless he wished to do it deliberately.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not misunderstand the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman did if he states that the statement which I made was identical with that of Chancellor Kent, although I have a high opinion of the eminent attainments of Chancellor Kent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in that case of Gibbons against Ogden, Chief Justice Kent affirmed that a proper construction of the Constitution of the United States required, as did also the dictates of the highest public policy, that the entire authority over the navigable waters in a State was vested, and ought to be vested, in the legislature of the State, under the constitution of the State.

The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. Fortunately for the welfare of the people of this Republic, there chanced at that time to be presiding in the Supreme Court the great Chief Justice John Marshall. He tore to shreds the reasoning and the statesmanship of this decision of Mr. Justice Kent, and in effect, so far as concerns purposes of navigation, forever confirmed in the Congress, under the Federal Constitution, absolute, unlimited authority over all navigable waters anywhere in the United States.

But another opinion, as to what is a lawful control of such navigable waters, is presented in the statement of the gentleman from New York, that the Government of the United States has no authority to control these waters except only for purposes of navigation.

Now, on grounds of the highest public policy that ought not to be the law; and, in my judgment, it is not the law. And the future best interests of the American people demand that it shall not be made the law.

It ought not to be the law because of the immeasurable possibilities of hydroelectric power development; because of such facts as that this power can be carried and successfully used hundreds of miles in every direction from a plant, and that power from one plant can be connected up with power from other plants long distances away, thus making possible, as time will show, such a vast concentration of control of power as the world has never yet seen.

The privilege of using the waters of a navigable stream to generate hydroelectric power is a thing of value. The right to grant or to deny such privilege belongs to the Federal Government; and, therefore, having this authority to be exercised wholly in its discretion, it may in making a grant of such a privilege impose terms and conditions.

That is the wise position for the Government to maintain if it is to look ahead and be careful of the future, and not, as has often been the case in this country, wait until abuses arrive and then be forced into a desperate struggle to remedy them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I want but one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The House resolution, when before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was amended, as the gentleman in charge of the bill has said, so that these revocable permits would expire by their terms on the 4th of March, instead of on the 1st of July next, as is provided in the Senate resolution. I would not agree that this should come up now under the request for unanimous consent unless that House amendment shall go in before the resolution is considered.

I reserve the right to vote against the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] if he would have any objection to inserting at the end of this joint resolution a proviso as follows: "Provided, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, impose reasonable rental charges"?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think that will go through.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, if the bill went through, it would have to go through if we agree on that proposition.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think the bill will go through with that in it.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the bill will run only two months. It would not be possible for the Public Service Commission of New York to rearrange the rights of these parties, which are now controlled by the public service commission, if a rental were put upon the companies. Another thing: Of course, the tacking on of an amendment like that would surely kill the bill in the Senate, because the Senate has already gone on record against the exacting of a compensation for power.

Mr. RAINEY. The Senate has not gone on record against the exacting of compensation for these privileges any more strongly than the House has gone on record for it.

Mr. SMITH of New York. If this were a plan to continue the permits permanently, we could discuss it more at length; but these permits are to run for only two months, and before these grants will expire the whole question of compensation will come up on this same water power, so that the gentleman will have full opportunity to get a vote, with a quorum present, after a discussion which may last for hours, on the whole subject of compensation.

Mr. RAINEY. May I inquire how it will come up?

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I am in favor of the proposition which he submits, and I believe the Committee on Foreign Affairs are in favor of it; and they have arranged for the committee to report a bill here dealing with this whole question, and we expect to get it up on the third Wednesday in January, when the call on Calendar Wednesday will rest with this committee.

Mr. RAINEY. Will that bill have reference to this diversion of the water from Niagara Falls?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. It will deal with no other subject.

Mr. RAINEY. Do the committee expect to stand for the policy which this House has announced so often heretofore?

Mr. FLOOD. I think so.

Mr. RAINEY. If the gentleman can assure me that the bill will contain this provision, I will not object.

Mr. FLOOD. The expressions around the table lead me to believe that undoubtedly the committee will stand for that policy.

Mr. SMITH of New York. The committee have voted favorably for compensation.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman assures me that the committee have voted favorably——

Mr. SMITH of New York. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. To include in the bill which they expect to consider in January a compensation provision?

Mr. SMITH of New York. Yes. I voted against it, but a majority of the committee voted for it.

Mr. FLOOD. They have voted for it, and have appointed a subcommittee to get it into shape to put into the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. Then the chairman assures me that it will be in the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of New York. The committee have voted to put it in the bill, and unless the committee should change their minds it will be in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who has been the leader of the House on this question of compensation—and we have all been following him—is absent from the House to-day, and I see that the other Members of the House who have been making this fight for compensation are largely absent, except myself. If the chairman of the committee will assure me that this will be in the bill to be considered in January, I shall not object, so far as I am concerned, to the consideration of this emergency measure now.

The SPEAKER. What does the chairman of the committee say?

Mr. FLOOD. I can assure the gentleman that it is my belief that it will be in the bill. The committee may change its mind between now and the time of reporting it, but I do not believe it will, and I do not think there is the slightest doubt about it being in the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. I think that is as far as the chairman can go, and I shall not object.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I see serious trouble ahead when all the best water power in the country is monopolized by a lot of soulless and conscienceless corporations, and I do not want that to take place. Now, I want to ask, if we fail to give this temporary relief, will it put a lot of plants and cities in the dark and visit a hardship on a lot of people who now obtain power from the Falls?

Mr. FLOOD. It will reduce the light that some cities have. It will reduce the power that a great many manufacturing plants have, and will close up some of them and throw a great many people out of employment.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. It will throw hundreds and thousands of people out of employment.

Mr. FLOOD. It will affect the entire country. It will affect all the users of acetylene gas. Farmers all over the country will not be able to get the carbide to run their little plants.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Are the people who are using this power using it under a permit from the Public Service Commission of New York?

Mr. FLOOD. They are using it under an expired permit from the Secretary of War of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Have they been paying anything to the State of New York for the use of this water?

Mr. FLOOD. No; they have not been paying anybody. They have been paying taxes on their property and franchises.

Mr. SMITH of New York. And paying taxes on their franchises, too.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I will not object to the temporary extension.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I said I should reserve the right to object unless it was understood that that amendment would be made.

Mr. FLOOD. We are certainly going to offer the amendment, and I believe it will be adopted. The gentleman can protect himself, however, by raising the point of no quorum if the amendment is not adopted.

Mr. SMITH of New York. We will put that in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue permits, revocable at will, for the diversion of water in the United States from the Niagara River above the Falls for the creation of power to individuals, companies, or corporations which are now actually producing power from the waters of said river in additional quantities which, with present diversions, shall in no case exceed the capacity of the generating machinery of the permittee and tenant companies now installed and ready for operation, nor an amount sufficient to enable the permittee to supply the now existing hydroelectric demands of the individuals, companies, or corporations which said permittee and tenant companies are now supplying, but not in excess of the capacity of power-using appliances of said consumers now installed and ready for operation: Provided, That in no event shall the total quantity of water diverted from said river above the Falls for power purposes exceed in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second: And provided further, That this resolution shall remain in force until the 1st day of July, 1917, and no longer, at the expiration of which time all permits granted hereunder shall terminate, unless sooner revoked; and nothing herein contained shall be held to confirm, establish, or confer in or upon any such permittee any right in or to the water which he is now diverting or which he may be authorized to divert hereunder.

Mr. FLOOD. I move to amend the joint resolution on page 2, line 4, by inserting, after the word "diverted," the words "in the United States."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "diverted," insert the words "in the United States," so that it will read:

"Provided, That in no event shall the total quantity of water diverted in the United States from said river above the Falls for power purposes exceed in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendments, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "first" and insert the word "fourth," and, in the same line, strike out the word "July" and insert the word "March," so that the line will read: "This resolution shall remain in force until the 4th day of March," etc.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Just a few moments.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, realizing that this resolution was important and an urgent matter, I did not object to its consideration by unanimous consent, but I have been advised that there are some rights of the Seneca Tribe of Indians which may be infringed upon by the passage of a permanent bill. I therefore have asked for this time in order that a letter addressed to me by the Seneca Tribe of Indians may be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the letter will be read in the gentleman's time.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

SIR: The Seneca Nation remonstrates against H. R. 3038, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "A bill for the control, etc., of the waters of Niagara River," introduced by Mr. CLINE.

This remonstrance is based upon the ground that the right to divert and use the waters of the Niagara above the great Falls for hydraulic power is in the Seneca Nation, because that right has never been ceded by them since they were confirmed therein by authorization of the treaty of Canadaigua in the year 1794.

The bill above referred to ignores this right to the Senecas and proposes to authorize and continue the use of these waters for hydraulic power in disregard of the rights of the Senecas.

In support of this remonstrance we refer to the documents, matters, and considerations submitted in our behalf to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in the last session, under date of July 15, 1914.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM C. HOAG,
President Allegany-Cattaragua Society.
WM. T. JONES,
President Chiefs' Council, Tanawa Senecas,
721 Powers Building, Rochester, N. Y.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, the rights of the Federal Government over the waters of Niagara are exactly the same as they are over any other navigable stream in the United States, any inland water; the same rights as are over the Mississippi River, the same as over the Coosa River in my own State, or any other great inland stream where water power may be developed. In addition to this is the fact that Niagara is a boundary stream, an international stream. So that if the Federal Government has the right to make a charge for the use of water at any place in the United States not located on public lands, it has it at Niagara. If a charge for the diversion of water ought to be made by the Government at any place it should be made at Niagara, because there the power is more convenient, is greater, is cheaper of development, and is more valuable than at any other place in the United States and perhaps in the whole world.

It is important in considering this resolution that we should understand exactly what the situation at Niagara is and what has been done heretofore. The power has been developed on a large scale at Niagara for 20 years or more by two concerns—the Niagara Falls Power Co. and Hydraulic Power Co. These concerns acted during a large part of that time solely under charters granted to them by the State of New York. They acted on the theory that the man who owned the banks of the stream had the right to do as he pleased with the water. During all these years this power of immense value has been developed by these two concerns without paying one cent therefor to the people of the United States or to the people of New York, other than as everybody else pays in taxes. They have never paid one cent for this valuable power to anybody, but they have continued to exercise these rights and privileges of untold value, and have been enabled to heap up vast fortunes. We have gone on in our time-honored American way encouraging industry, making millionaires, and depressing the condition of the proletariat.

During all these years these two concerns have been allowed to go on in their own way without regulation, without any attempt to fix the price for the power, or fix conditions upon which they should deliver it. That they have grossly abused the valuable privileges which they have enjoyed no man who has investigated the situation can for a moment reny.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If you please, not just now. In 1906 this matter of the regulation of the diversion of water from Niagara came up as a live question in the Congress. At that time we passed what is known as the Burton law. I wish to refer to that law and will extend it in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BURTON LAW.

[Public, No. 367.]

An act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the diversion of water from Niagara River or its tributaries, in the State of New York, is hereby prohibited, except with the consent of the Secretary of War as hereinafter authorized in section 2 of this act: Provided, That this prohibition shall not be interpreted as forbidding the diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes or of Niagara River for sanitary or domestic purposes, or for navigation, the amount of which may be fixed from time to time by the Congress of the United States, or by the Secretary of War of the United States under its direction.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant permits for the diversion of water in the United States from said Niagara River or its tributaries for the creation of power to individuals, companies, or corporations which are now actually producing power from the waters of said river, or its tributaries, in the State of New York, or from the Erie Canal; also permits for the transmission of power from the Dominion of Canada into the United States, to companies legally authorized therefor, both for diversion and transmission, as hereinafter stated, but permits for diversion shall be issued only to the individuals, companies, or corporations as aforesaid, and only to the amount now actually in use or contracted to be used in factories the buildings for which are now in process of construction, not exceeding to any one individual, company, or corporation as aforesaid a maximum amount of 8,600 cubic feet per second, and not exceeding to all individuals, companies, or corporations as aforesaid an aggregate amount of 15,600 cubic feet per second; but no revocable permits shall be issued by the said Secretary under the provisions hereafter set forth for the diversion of additional amounts of water from the said river or its tributaries until the approximate amount for which permits may be issued as above, to wit, 15,600 cubic feet per second, shall for a period of not less than six months have been diverted from the waters of said river or its tributaries, in the State of New York: Provided, That the said Secretary, subject to the provisions of section 5 of this act, under the limitations relating to time above set forth, is hereby authorized to grant revocable permits, from time to time, to such individuals, companies, or corporations, or their assigns, for the diversion of additional amounts of water from the said river or its tributaries to such amount, if any, as, in connection with the amount diverted on the Canadian side, shall not injure or interfere with the navigable capacity of said river, or its integrity and proper volume as a boundary stream, or the scenic grandeur of Niagara Falls; and that the quantity of electrical power which may by permits be allowed to be transmitted from the Dominion of Canada into the United States shall be 160,000 horsepower: Provided further, That the Secretary, subject to the provisions of section 5 of this act, may issue revocable permits for the transmission of additional electrical power so generated in Canada, but in no event shall the amount included in such permits, together with the said 160,000 horsepower and the amount generated and used in Canada, exceed 350,000 horsepower: Provided always, That the provisions herein permitting diversions and fixing the aggregate horsepower herein permitted to be transmitted into the United States, as aforesaid, are intended as a limitation on the authority of the Secretary of War, and shall in no wise be construed as a direction to said Secretary to issue permits, and the Secretary of War shall make regulations preventing or limiting the diversion of water and the admission of electrical power as herein stated; and the permits for the transmission of electrical power issued by the Secretary of War may specify the persons, companies, or corporations by whom the same shall be transmitted, and the persons, companies, or corporations to whom the same shall be delivered.

SEC. 3. That any person, company, or corporation diverting water from the said Niagara River or its tributaries, or transmitting electrical power into the United States from Canada, except as herein stated, or violating any of the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,500, nor less than $500, or by imprisonment (in the case of a natural person) not exceeding one year, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court. And, further, the removal of any structures or parts of structures erected in violation of this act, or any construction incidental to or used for such diversion of water or transmission of power as is herein prohibited, as well as any diversion of water or transmission of power in violation hereof, may be enforced or enjoined at the suit of the United States by any circuit court having jurisdiction in any district in which the same may be located, and proper proceedings to this end may be instituted under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States is respectfully requested to open negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for the purpose of effectually providing by suitable treaty with said Government for such regulation and control of the waters of Niagara River and its tributaries as will preserve the scenic grandeur of Niagara Falls and of the rapids in said river.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall remain in force for three years from and after date of its passage, at the expiration of which time all permits granted hereunder by the Secretary of War shall terminate unless sooner revoked, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to revoke any or all permits granted by him by authority of this act, and nothing herein contained shall be held to confirm, establish, or confer any rights heretofore claimed or exercised in the diversion of water or the transmission of power.

SEC. 6. That for accomplishing the purposes detailed in this act the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Approved, June 29, 1906.

I read from section 2 of the Burton law as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant a permit for the diversion of the water in the United States from said Niagara River or its tributaries for the creation of power to individuals, companies, or corporations which are now actually producing power from waters of said river—

And so on.

By the terms of the act the President was requested to negotiate a treaty with the British Government which would settle the international aspects of the power situation at Niagara.

By section 5 of the Burton law it was provided that the provisions of the act should remain in force for three years from the date of its passage, and that at the expiration of that time the permit granted by the Secretary of War should terminate, and so forth.

During that three years the treaty was negotiated, but was not proclaimed, so that on March 3, 1909, Congress passed a resolution extending the Burton law two years from June 29, 1909.

House joint resolution 262, extending the operation of an act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

Whereas the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes," approved June 29, 1906, will expire by limitation on June 29, 1909; and

Whereas a date for the termination of the operation of said act was provided therein, but with a view to the more permanent settlement of the questions involved by a treaty with Great Britain, and by further legislation appropriate to the situation, and such treaty not having been negotiated, it is desirable that the provisions of said act should be continued until such permanent settlement can be made: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the aforesaid act be, and they are hereby, extended for two years from June 29, 1909, being the date of the expiration of the operation of said act, save in so far, as any portion thereof may be found inapplicable or already complied with.

Approved, March 3, 1909.

The treaty with the British Government was negotiated, and the rights of the respective high contracting parties were fixed thereby. The right of the Federal Government of the United States to use 20,000 cubic feet per second was agreed upon, and the right of the Canadian Government to take 36,000 feet was fixed.

I extend the treaty in my remarks, as I think the public ought to know its terms:

TREATY SERIES, No. 548—TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN—BOUNDARY WATERS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Signed at Washington January 11, 1909.
Ratification advised by the Senate March 3, 1909.
Ratified by the President April 1, 1910.
Ratified by Great Britain March 31, 1910.
Ratifications exchanged at Washington May 5, 1910.
Proclaimed May 13, 1910.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, to prevent disputes regarding the use of boundary waters and to settle all questions which are now pending between the United States and the Dominion of Canada involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier, and to make provision for the adjustment and settlement of all such questions as may hereafter arise, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at Washington on the 11th day of January, 1909, the original of which treaty is, word for word, as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being equally desirous to prevent disputes regarding the use of boundary waters and to settle all questions which are now pending between the United States and the Dominion of Canada involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier, and to make provision for the adjustment and settlement of all such questions as may hereafter arise, have resolved to conclude a treaty in furtherance of these ends, and for that purpose have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Elihu Root, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Britannic Majesty, the Right Hon. James Bryce, O. M., his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington.

Who, after having communicated to one another their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

PRELIMINARY ARTICLE.

For the purposes of this treaty boundary waters are defined as the waters from main shore to main shore of the lakes and rivers and connecting waterways or the portions thereof along which the international boundary between the United States and the Dominion of Canada passes, including all bays, arms, and inlets thereof, but not including tributary waters which in their natural channels would flow into such lakes, rivers, and waterways, or waters flowing from such lakes, rivers, and waterways, or the waters of rivers flowing across the boundary.

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries.

It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of Lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters and now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line. Either of the high contracting parties may adopt rules and regulations governing the use of such canals within its own territory and may charge tolls for the use thereof, but all such rules and regulations and all tolls charged shall apply alike to the subjects of citizens of the high contracting parties and the ships, vessels, and boats of both of the high contracting parties, and they shall be placed on terms of equality in the use thereof.

ARTICLE II.

Each of the high contracting parties reserves to itself or to the several State governments on the one side and the Dominion or Provincial Governments on the other, as the case may be, subject to any treaty provisions now existing with respect thereto, the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters; but it is agreed that any interference with or diversion from their natural channel of such waters on either side of the boundary resulting in any injury on the other side of the boundary shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in the country where such diversion or interference occurs; but this provision shall not apply to cases already existing or to cases expressly covered by special agreement between the parties hereto.

It is understood, however, that neither of the high contracting parties intends by the foregoing provision to surrender any right which it may have to object to any interference with or diversions of waters on the other side of the boundary the effect of which would be productive of material injury to the navigation interests on its own side of the boundary.

ARTICLE III.

It is agreed that, in addition to the uses, obstructions, and diversions heretofore permitted or hereafter provided for by special agreement between the parties hereto, no further or other uses or obstructions or diversions, whether temporary or permanent, of boundary waters on either side of the line, affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters on the other side of the line, shall be made except by authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions and with the approval, as hereinafter provided, of a joint commission, to be known as the International Joint Commission.

The foregoing provisions are not intended to limit or interfere with the existing rights of the Government of the United States on the one side, and the Government of the Dominion of Canada on the other, to undertake and carry on governmental works in boundary waters for the deepening of channels, the construction of breakwaters, the improvement of harbors, and other governmental works for the benefit of commerce and navigation, provided that such works are wholly on its own side of the line and do not materially affect the level or flow of the boundary waters on the other, nor are such provisions intended to interfere with the ordinary use of such waters for domestic and sanitary purposes.

ARTICLE IV.

The high contracting parties agree that, except in cases provided for by special agreement between them, they will not permit the construction or maintenance on their respective sides of the boundary of any remedial or protective works or any dams or other obstructions in waters flowing from boundary waters or in waters at a lower level than the boundary in rivers flowing across the boundary, the effect of which is to raise the natural level of waters on the other side of the boundary unless the construction or maintenance thereof is approved by the aforesaid International Joint Commission.

It is further agreed that the waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other.

ARTICLE V.

The high contracting parties agree that it is expedient to limit the diversion of waters from the Niagara River so that the level of Lake Erie and the flow of the stream shall not be appreciably affected. It is the desire of both parties to accomplish this object with the least possible injury to investments which have already been made in the construction of power plants on the United States side of the river under grants of authority from the State of New York, and on the Canadian side of the river under licenses authorized by the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario.

So long as this treaty shall remain in force no diversion of the waters of the Niagara River above the Falls from the natural course and stream thereof shall be permitted except for the purposes and to the extent hereinafter provided.

The United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the State of New York of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second.

The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada, or the Province of Ontario, may authorize and permit the diversion within the Province of Ontario of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 36,000 cubic feet of water per second.

The prohibitions of this article shall not apply to the diversion of water for sanitary or domestic purposes, or for the service of canals for the purposes of navigation.

ARTICLE VI.

The high contracting parties agree that the St. Mary and Milk Rivers and their tributaries (in the State of Montana and the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan) are to be treated as one stream for the purposes of irrigation and power, and the waters thereof shall be apportioned equally between the two countries, but in making such equal apportionment more than half may be taken from one river and less than half from the other by either country, so as to afford a more beneficial use to each. It is further agreed that in the division of such waters during the irrigation season, between the 1st of April and 31st of October, inclusive, annually, the United States is entitled to a prior appropriation of 500 cubic feet per second of the waters of the Milk River, or so much of such amount as constitutes three-fourths of its natural flow, and that Canada is entitled to a prior appropriation of 500 cubic feet per second of the flow of St. Mary River, or so much of such amount as constitutes three-fourths of its natural flow.

The channel of the Milk River in Canada may be used at the convenience of the United States for the conveyance, while passing through Canadian territory, of waters diverted from the St. Mary River. The provisions of Article II of this treaty shall apply to any injury resulting to property in Canada from the conveyance of such waters through the Milk River.

The measurement and apportionment of the water to be used by each country shall from time to time be made jointly by the properly constituted reclamation officers of the United States and the properly constituted irrigation officers of His Majesty, under the direction of the International Joint Commission.

ARTICLE VII.

The high contracting parties agree to establish and maintain an International Joint Commission of the United States and Canada, composed of six commissioners—three on the part of the United States, appointed by the President thereof, and three on the part of the United Kingdom, appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of the governor in council of the Dominion of Canada.

ARTICLE VIII.

This International Joint Commission shall have jurisdiction over and shall pass upon all cases involving the use or obstruction or diversion of the waters with respect to which, under Articles III and IV of this treaty, the approval of this commission is required, and in passing upon such cases the commission shall be governed by the following rules or principles which are adopted by the high contracting parties for this purpose:

The high contracting parties shall have, each on its own side of the boundary, equal and similar rights in the use of the waters hereinbefore defined as boundary waters.

The following order of precedence shall be observed among the various uses enumerated hereinafter for these waters, and no use shall be permitted which tends materially to conflict with or restrain any other use which is given preference over it in this order of precedence:

First. Uses for domestic and sanitary purposes.

Second. Uses for navigation, including the service of canals for the purposes of navigation.

Third. Uses for power and for irrigation purposes.

The foregoing provisions shall not apply to or disturb any existing uses of boundary waters on either side of the boundary.

The requirement for an equal division may, in the discretion of the commission, be suspended in cases of temporary diversions along boundary waters at points where such equal division can not be made advantageously on account of local conditions, and where such diversion does not diminish elsewhere the amount available for use on the other side.

The commission in its discretion may make its approval in any case conditional upon the construction of remedial or protective works, to compensate, so far as possible, for the particular use or diversion proposed, and in such cases may require that suitable and adequate provision, approved by the commission, be made for the protection and indemnity against injury of any interests on either side of the boundary.

In cases involving the elevation of the natural level of waters on either side of the line as a result of the construction or maintenance on the other side of remedial or protective works or dams or other obstructions in boundary waters or in waters flowing therefrom or in waters below the boundary in rivers flowing across the boundary, the commission shall require, as a condition of its approval thereof, that suitable and adequate provision, approved by it, be made for the protection and indemnity of all interests on the other side of the line which may be injured thereby.

The majority of the commissioners shall have power to render a decision. In case the commission is evenly divided upon any question or matter presented to it for decision, separate reports shall be made by the commissioners on each side to their own Government. The high contracting parties shall thereupon endeavor to agree upon an adjustment of the question or matter of difference, and if an agreement is reached between them it shall be reduced to writing in the form of a protocol, and shall be communicated to the commissioners, who shall take such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out such agreement.

ARTICLE IX.

The high contracting parties further agree that any other questions or matters of difference arising between them involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other, along the common frontier between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, shall be referred from time to time to the international joint commission for examination and report, whenever either the Government of the United States or the Government of the Dominion of Canada shall request that such questions or matters of difference be so referred.

The international joint commission is authorized in each case so referred to examine into and report upon the facts and circumstances of the particular questions and matters referred, together with such conclusions and recommendations as may be appropriate, subject, however, to any restrictions or exceptions which may be imposed with respect thereto by the terms of the reference.

Such reports of the commissions shall not be regarded as decisions of the questions or matters so submitted either on the facts or the law, and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award.

The commission shall make a joint report to both Governments in all cases in which all or a majority of the commissioners agree, and in case of disagreement the minority may make a joint report to both Governments or separate reports to their respective Governments.

In case the commission is evenly divided upon any question or matter referred to it for report, separate reports shall be made by the commissioners on each side to their own Government.

ARTICLE X.

Any questions or matters of difference arising between the high contracting parties involving the rights, obligations, or interests of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada either in relation to each other or to their respective inhabitants, may be referred for decision to the international joint commission by the consent of the two parties, it being understood that on the part of the United States any such action will be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and on the part of His Majesty's Government with the consent of the Governor General in Council. In each case so referred the said commission is authorized to examine into and report upon the facts and circumstances of the particular questions and matters referred, together with such conclusions and recommendations as may be appropriate, subject, however, to any restrictions or exceptions which may be imposed with respect thereto by the terms of the reference.

A majority of the said commission shall have power to render a decision or finding upon any of the questions or matters so referred.

If the said commission is equally divided or otherwise unable to render a decision or finding as to any questions or matters so referred, it shall be the duty of the commissioners to make a joint report to both Governments, or separate reports to their respective Governments, showing the different conclusions arrived at with regard to the matters or questions so referred, which questions or matters shall thereupon be referred for decision by the high contracting parties to an umpire chosen in accordance with the procedure prescribed in the fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of Article XLV of The Hague Convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, dated October 18, 1907. Such umpire shall have power to render a final decision with respect to those matters and questions so referred on which the commission failed.

ARTICLE XI.

A duplicate original of all decisions rendered and joint reports made by the commission shall be transmitted to and filed with the Secretary of State of the United States and the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada, and to them shall be addressed all communications of the commissions.

ARTICLE XII.

The international joint commission shall meet and organize at Washington promptly after the members thereof are appointed, and when organized the commission may fix such times and places for its meetings as may be necessary, subject at all times to special call or direction by the two Governments. Each commissioner, upon the first joint meeting of the commission after his appointment, shall, before proceeding with the work of the commission, make and subscribe a solemn declaration in writing that he will faithfully and impartialy perform the duties imposed upon him under this treaty, and such declaration shall be entered on the records of the proceedings of the commission.

The United States and Canadian sections of the commission may each appoint a secretary, and these shall act as joint secretaries of the commission at its joint sessions, and the commission may employ engineers and clerical assistants from time to time as it may deem advisable. The salaries and personal expenses of the commission and of the secretaries shall be paid by their respective Governments, and all reasonable and necessary joint expenses of the commission incurred by it shall be paid in equal moieties by the high contracting parties.

The commission shall have power to administer oaths to witnesses, and to take evidence on oath whenever deemed necessary in any proceeding, or inquiry, or matter within its jurisdiction under this treaty, and all parties interested therein shall be given convenient opportunity to be heard, and the high contracting parties agree to adopt such legislation as may be appropriate and necessary to give the commission the powers above mentioned on each side of the boundary, and to provide for the issue of subpœnas and for compelling the attendance of witnesses in proceedings before the commission. The commission may adopt such rules of procedure as shall be in accordance with justice and equity and may make such examination in person and through agents or employees as may be deemed advisable.

ARTICLE XIII.

In all cases where special agreements between the high contracting parties hereto are referred to in the foregoing articles, such agreements are understood and intended to include not only direct agreements between the high contracting parties, but also any mutual arrangement between the United States and the Dominion of Canada expressed by concurrence or reciprocal legislation on the part of Congress and the Parliament of the Dominion.

ARTICLE XIV.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the treaty shall take effect on the date of the exchange of its ratifications. It shall remain in force for five years, dating from the day of exchange of ratifications, and thereafter until terminated by twelve months' written notice given by either high contracting party to the other.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington the 11th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1909.

(Signed) ELIHU ROOT. [SEAL.]
(Signed) JAMES BRYCE. [SEAL.]

And whereas the Senate of the United States by their resolution of March 3, 1909 (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), did advise and consent to the ratification of the said treaty with the following understanding to wit:

Resolved further (as a part of this ratification), That the United States approves this treaty with the understanding that nothing in this treaty shall be construed as effecting or changing any existing territorial or riparian rights in the water, or rights of the owners of land under water, on either side of the international boundary at the rapids of the St. Marys River at Sault Ste. Marie, in the use of the waters flowing over such lands, subject to the requirements of navigation in boundary waters, and of navigation canals, and without prejudice to the existing right of the United States and Canada, each to use the waters of the St. Marys River within its own territory; and further, that nothing in this treaty shall be construed to interfere with the drainage of wet, swamp, and overflowed lands into streams flowing into boundary waters and that this interpretation will be mentioned in the ratification of this treaty as conveying the true meaning of the treaty, and will, in effect, form part of the treaty.

And whereas the said understanding has been accepted by the Government of Great Britain, and the ratifications of the two Governments of the said treaty were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 5th day of May, 1910;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, William Howard Taft, President of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty and the said understanding, as forming a part thereof, to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 13th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1910, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-fourth.

[SEAL.] WM. H. TAFT.

By the President:
P. C. KNOX,
Secretary of State.

PROTOCOL OF EXCHANGE.

On proceeding to an exchange of the ratifications of the treaty signed at Washington on January 11, 1909, between the United States and Great Britain, relating to boundary waters and questions arising along the boundary between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, the undersigned plenipotentiaries, duly authorized thereto by their respective Governments, hereby declare that nothing in this treaty shall be construed as affecting, or changing, any existing territorial or riparian rights in the water, or rights of the owners of lands under water, on either side of the international boundary at the rapids of the St. Marys River at Sault Ste. Marie, in the use of the waters flowing over such lands, subject to the requirements of navigation in boundary waters and of navigation canals, and without prejudice to the existing right of the United States and Canada, each to use the waters of the St. Marys River, within its own territory; and further, that nothing in this treaty shall be construed to interfere with the drainage of wet, swamp, and overflowed lands into streams flowing into boundary waters, and also that this declaration shall be deemed to have equal force and effect as the treaty itself and to form an integral part thereto.

The exchange of ratifications then took place in the usual form.

In witness whereof they have signed the present protocol of exchange and have affixed their seals thereto.

Done at Washington this 5th day of May, 1910.

PHILANDER C. KNOX. [SEAL.]
JAMES BRYCE. [SEAL.]

It was contemplated all the time that there would be a general law passed by Congress which upon some permanent, fair, and just plan would fix the terms on which the generating companies operating at Niagara Falls might take the water. But no such general law has ever been passed. The two years mentioned in the resolution of March 3, 1909, went by so that again a resolution of extension was passed. The last resolution of extension expired on March 4, 1913. From that time to this good day, over three years, these power companies at Niagara Falls have been enjoying this great natural resource of the people without any authority of law, without color of right, and without paying one cent for it.

In the resolutions extending the Burton law it was provided, as provided in the original law, that the right to use the water should be given only to those two original companies. Their rights were protected and safeguarded. Competition with them was prevented. Again we find that this resolution that we are considering here to-day also provides that the Secretary of War shall continue to give not to anybody who wants it, not to anybody who is entitled to it and willing to pay for it, but to these same two companies who have enjoyed this great monopoly all these years, the complete and sole use of the water on the American side of this great power site, and that they shall continue to have it. That is done upon the ground of emergency, and that is the explanation given as to why we should at this moment, with Congress in the act of taking its recess for the Christmas holidays and a quorum not in the city, pass this resolution. The resolution before us to-day secures the use of the water to the same two companies, without restriction in the charge they may make, without regulation or restraint. It is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 326) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue permits revocable at will for the diversion of water in the United States from the Niagara River above the Falls for the creation of power, to individuals, companies, or corporations which are now actually producing power from the waters of said river, in additional quantities, which, with present diversions, shall in no case exceed the capacity of the generating machinery of the permittee and tenant companies now installed and ready for operation, nor an amount sufficient to enable the permittee to supply the now existing hydroelectric demands of the individuals, companies, or corporations which said permittee and tenant companies are now supplying, but not in excess of the capacity of power-using appliances of said consumers now installed and ready for operation: Provided, That in no event shall the total quantity of water diverted in the United States from said river above the Falls for power purposes exceed in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second: And provided further, That this resolution shall remain in force until the 4th day of March, 1917, and no longer, at the expiration of which time all permits granted hereunder shall terminate, unless sooner revoked; and nothing herein contained shall be held to confirm, establish, or confer in or upon any such permittee any right in or to the water which he is now diverting or which he may be authorized to divert hereunder.

How have the power companies exercised the valuable rights which we preserve to them so carefully? Have their powers been abused? Why, without any doubt whatsoever. Have the people of western New York been exploited and sweated for the benefit of these corporations? It is undoubtedly true. Not only is that true in the past, but it is true right down to this very day, and we are contemplating the extension and continuation of that exploitation when we adopt this resolution that we have under consideration.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. Can the gentleman inform me what disposition the Supreme Court of the United States has made of the case pending there which has reference to the attempt of New York State to give away power at the Long Sault Rapids to a company organized by the Aluminum Co. of North America?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I would not like to speak upon that subject. I am not prepared to answer the gentleman's question as thoroughly as it should be answered.

Mr. RAINEY. I understand the Supreme Court has just decided against the State of New York.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not wish to enter into a discussion respecting the rights of the United States as to these water-power sites, but I do not think any lawyer will doubt that, if it is necessary to get permission from the Federal Government to use and divert the water, we can grant that permission upon such terms as we choose. [Applause.] I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt upon that subject, and if we give away this valuable power to private interests at Niagara, I want to say that no Member can defend himself in charging or making any terms to dam site users in other parts of the country. The same principle applies to all diversion of navigable waters, with the added reason as to Niagara that it is an international boundary stream.

The power companies at Niagara are still abusing their powers, they are still exploiting the people of Niagara, Buffalo, and western New York. I want to take from the hearings some facts that were laid before our committee in that connection.

I should explain first that they have a different way of doing these things in Canada. They have a different method of handling these things. In Canada there is a hydroelectric commission, which undertakes to stand between the people and these exploiters and monopolists of power generation. The Canadian plan is as follows, as testified to in the hearings:

A number of years ago Sir Adam Beck obtained authority for the hydroelectric commission of the Province of Ontario to purchase or generate power and distribute it at cost to the municipalities through a transmission line. It went into the cost and found that it could generate power at one site for $4 and a fraction per horsepower per annum and at another site for $5 per horsepower per annum. It finally decided upon the price the Ontario company offered of $9.40. That power was purchased and transmitted by the hydroelectric commission at cost. They purchased it at $9.40 per horsepower paid the Ontario Power Co. per annum. Then they built the transmission lines as far west as Windsor, opposite from Detroit.

It has been a great success, to such an extent that they have now decided to introduce radial railways; that is, interurban railways supplied with current through the same transmission lines, so as to take care of the valley of the load and more nearly give a flat load line.

The city of Toronto pays $15 for 24-hour power, but the New York consumer pays $22.

Mr. SIMS. Per horsepower?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes. Citizens of Canada farther away from the Falls than the New York people who are using the power pay 3 cents a kilowatt hour, and the lowest price I heard of in New York at all where it was given to the people for domestic consumption was 4½ cents per kilowatt hour. The flat price in Buffalo is 8 cents, with 1 cent off where they pay the bill promptly. The city of Cleveland has a municipal plant where they generate power by steam, an expensive method of generation, so it is said. In that city they sell the power at 3 cents per kilowatt hour. Cleveland is getting steam-generated power at 3 cents and Buffalo hydroelectric power at 7 cents. That is not, of course, the price that is paid by the large users, but, so far as I can get any information, the lowest price for which the American companies sell power to the large consumers is $16 per horsepower, and it runs on up—they charge whatever the traffic will bear. They get all they can. They discriminate at pleasure, and the price in some instances goes as high as thirty-five and forty dollars per horsepower. Over on the Canadian side, where power may be generated, so it is said, for from four to five dollars per horsepower, the commission is buying it from private generators at $9.40 and selling it at cost to the municipalities and consumers of Canada.

I have no intention to go into this question extensively. I wish merely to bring the situation to the notice of the House. The situation is peculiar. Whether there is an emergency is doubtful, very doubtful, indeed. What are the facts? These two companies at Niagara are taking the 15,600 cubic feet per second that they have been taking all of the time. They have not had any right to take it since 1913, but they are still taking it, and, whether we pass this resolution or not, they will continue to do so.

What more are these companies doing? Why, they went to Secretary Baker last May, and he, in ignorance of what his authority was under the law, gave them the right to take 1,200 cubic feet per second additional, and they took that. This permit expired on the 1st day of November. Did they stop taking it? No; they do not do things that way. They have been going on taking it and are taking it to-day. It is not a case where we are depriving them of anything they have ever had that creates this emergency. They want to take more water; that is why they call it an emergency. They have got a demand for the power, and that is why they want the water to make it.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. LONDON. If that is the gentleman's opinion, how can he consistently vote for the resolution?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not now intend to do so. We are confronted by a strange situation. These power companies have been so powerful that they have stayed the arm of Congress. Congress has not been able through all these years to write a water bill for the protection of the American people in the development of this water power. [Applause.] That is the situation to which I am calling attention. I doubt whether we will be able during this Congress or any other Congress to pass a law that will justly protect these rights.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MAYS. I hear of 36,000 cubic feet per second being taken from this river on one side and 20,000 cubic feet per second on the other, and there is a further grant of 15,000 cubic feet per second——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A further grant of 4,400 cubic feet per second.

Mr. MAYS. Altogether that seems to be like a good deal of dampness. How much water does the Niagara River yield under a normal flow?

Mr. DEMPSEY. About 600,000 cubic feet per second, which is about one-twelfth the total amount.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The point I am driving at at this time is not the protection of the scenic beauty of Niagara, because that is another question. But where water is diverted we ought to see that it is taken on fair terms, to the public, taken out in such a manner as to protect the American people. I want to see power from Niagara developed under such regulations and in such manner as to protect the actual users and particularly the small users; the man who wants to use electricity in his home. He is the man to whom we should give chief consideration and see that his interests are protected.

I do not care very much about this so-called emergency of industry. These great industries located at Niagara can run by steam just as well as by water; it is purely a question of economy so far as that is concerned. These industries are of no great interest to the people except in a most indirect way, in a most attenuated way. They give opportunity for the employment of a number of American people. But at what wages? Do the employers take the cheap power into consideration in fixing wages? Oh, no, nothing like that; they hire men to work for the very least wage they can get them for. During August of this year several hundred of the employees of these industries went on a strike on the claim that they were unable to live decently on the wages paid. Labor disputes are as acute in Niagara as they are anywhere else.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if there has been any question before the Congress in the last few years where so much misinformation has been given to the Members as in relation to the development of power at Niagara Falls. It is a fact, as many of you undoubtedly know, that the first great power development in this country was at Niagara Falls. The investors went in there and spent probably $20,000,000 on what was an experimental plant. They had the courage to put their money into something which they did not know would ever produce a revenue, and years went by without a revenue, without an opportunity to sell their power, but finally the time came when a market appeared. This plant was established and the power was sold, and then another company came in and began developing electric power and that was sold. Now power plants in all parts of the United States have become common, so to speak. These plants at Niagara Falls are operated under exactly the same conditions as other plants throughout the United States. Their rates are regulated by the public service commission of New York. These rates have been reduced within the last three or four years, and, contrary to the statement made by my friend from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], the rates are not nearly so high in many cases as they are in the Dominion of Canada. The gentleman spoke about rates in Toronto. I have been informed, and I believe reliably, that the rates in the city of Syracuse for Niagara Falls power are lower than in Toronto, although Toronto is 100 miles from Niagara Falls and Syracuse is 160 miles. Speaking of the rate charged in Canada by the Ontario Power Co. being lower than we have on this side, the gentleman from Alabama said the power is sold at $9 per horsepower. He does not take into consideration, however, the fact that this power is sold at the switchboard, and not to private consumers or municipal plants.

It is to be transmitted to municipalities. It is to be sold wherever it is delivered. Now, I have no doubt that the hydroelectric commission of Canada has established lower rates than we have in the United States, but in many instances power is sold on the American side as low as $12 per horsepower, and I understand in some cases it is sold even below that. And that illustrates the fact that if the rates are properly regulated by a public service commission there is no danger of extortion by the companies which are transmitting or selling the power.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman object if I asked him a few questions concerning this matter?

Mr. SMITH of New York. No.

Mr. MANN. How much water is now being diverted on the American side?

Mr. SMITH of New York. There is about 15,600 cubic feet per second and about 1,200 cubic feet in addition which is being diverted, contrary to the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], with the express permission of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of War has stated that while he granted such a permit it expired November 1, and he had no legal authority.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He stated that, but at the same time extended the permit.

Mr. MANN. Did he extend the permit after November 1?

Mr. SMITH of New York. Oh, yes; it has been extended until December 31, until the first unit of a steam plant which is now being erected near Buffalo on Niagara River can be completed.

Mr. MANN. When was it extended?

Mr. SMITH of New York. I believe it was in the middle of November.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary did not make that statement when he was before the Committee on Foreign Affairs on December 2. He said he had not extended it.

Mr. SMITH of New York. The Secretary did extend the permit, and he made a statement regarding the extension to a delegation of which I was a member.

Mr. MANN. There are 1,200 cubic feet per second under which they have some kind of permit.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And 15,600 cubic feet. Is there any authority from the Federal Government for them to take that?

Mr. SMITH of New York. There is no authority except the treaty.

Mr. MANN. The treaty does not give any authority.

Mr. SMITH of New York. No; except it states the limit.

Mr. MANN. The treaty gives the right to grant authority to them.

Mr. SMITH of New York. The exception in that is this, that the Burton law has given express permission.

Mr. MANN. While it existed.

Mr. SMITH of New York. While it existed.

Mr. MANN. While it existed the Secretary of War notified these companies that if they diverted water to the limit of 36,000 cubic feet he would not permit it? They are using 15,600 cubic feet without any authority of law and 1,200 feet under the permit of the Secretary of War, which was granted without any authority of law, and now it is proposed to expend the entire amount and give them the authority of Congress for the whole amount, 20,000, up to the 4th of March.

Mr. FLOOD. That is it exactly. The gentleman has stated the proposition correctly.

Mr. MANN. That gives them the legal authority for the full 20,000, they not having now any authority at all up to the 4th of March? In view of the past, the fact is that when their permits expired before no attention was paid to the expiration, but they continued to use the same amount of water as they did before. Can the gentleman assure the House that if extension is not granted by Congress, after the 4th of March they will not continue the use of the 20,000 cubic feet just as they please?

Mr. SMITH of New York. I am confident the Secretary of War will prevent them from using any water above that amount.

Mr. MANN. Why? They have no authority to use the 30,000 cubic feet; they have no authority to use the 1,200 cubic feet; and the only authority they will acquire at all for any of it, so far as authority is concerned, will be by the passage of this resolution, which expires by the 4th of March. When it expired before they did not pay any attention to it. They did not pay any attention to the permit issued by the Secretary of War on November 1.

Mr. SMITH of New York. They came before the Secretary of War and got permission.

Mr. MANN. Not after November 1.

Mr. SMITH of New York. There was no part of the 1,200 cubic feet of water diverted by either of the power companies without permission by the Secretary of War. I do not know the dates, but I know that to be the fact.

Mr. MANN. Very well. They have not increased the amount they used without asking permission?

Mr. SMITH of New York. No.

Mr. MANN. And in no case have they cut off the amount they had once acquired by the expiration of the permission. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMITH of New York. No; that is not correct.

Mr. MANN. Where did they cut off any?

Mr. SMITH of New York. Secretary Garrison permitted the diversion of 1,200 cubic feet, and that was cut off. They came back to Secretary Baker, and he issued another permit. But under that permit of Secretary Garrison it was cut off instantly.

Mr. MANN. When was that?

Mr. SMITH of New York. Last summer.

Mr. MANN. He was not there last summer.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I say the permit ran until some time in the summer; I believe in July.

Mr. MANN. And Secretary Baker came in and issued a new permit about April 1?

Mr. SMITH of New York. I have forgotten the date; but I know that Secretary Garrison issued the first permit, and I know that Secretary Baker has told this power company that on December 31 the power will be cut off.

Mr. MANN. How will they cut it off?

Mr. SMITH of New York. Secretary Baker will notify them that it must be stopped.

Mr. MANN. Will they stop it? There is no authority. That is what I want to find out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I would like to have one more minute, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois this: That when the Burton law expired I was opposed to extending it at that time because I believed that we would never get permanent legislation on the subject of this development unless the temporary permits were stopped. When the Burton law did expire the power companies were in the position of closing down their plants or continuing as they had been doing. One of the companies began taking more water than it had before, and I went personally to the Secretary of War and notified him of this fact, and he instantly told this company that if it went beyond the limit provided in the Burton law he would cut off all the water. But he stated at that time—and I think he was entirely correct in it—that Congress had failed to provide a law under which these companies could divert water and produce power, and it was not up to him to prevent the continuation of the operation of the plants.

Mr. MANN. That will be the case after the 4th of March. Congress will not pass any permanent legislation, and the gentleman knows it as well as I do.

Mr. SMITH of New York. So far as I am concerned I would go to the Secretary of War and ask him to reduce these companies down to 15,600 feet.

Mr. MANN. This will give them 20,000 feet. Will the gentleman ask the Secretary of War to cut it all off?

Mr. SMITH of New York. No; I will not, Mr. Speaker, because——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York knows there is a vast distinction between 15,600 cubic feet a second in violation of law and 20,000 cubic feet a second in violation of the law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, we are about to legalize in this House the illegal acts of certain companies now diverting water from the Niagara River, and we are informed that, in palliation of this procedure, we are going to pass, or attempt to pass, through this House in January a regulatory measure in which the committee will attempt to compel these companies to pay some compensation for the valuable privileges they enjoy there now.

I know of no better place in this country than this to commence exacting compensation from these companies. The statement was made on the floor that power is sold there as cheap or cheaper perhaps than $12 per horsepower. The evidence available, however, shows that ordinary manufacturers in the American cities near Niagara Falls pay just about as much for their hydroelectric power as they would be compelled to pay for power generated by themselves or by some other company out of coal.

Now, I will undertake to say that an investigation of this subject will show that back of this grab is the Aluminum Co. of America, closely allied with the General Electric, and part of the water-power trust of the United States. The statement has been made on the floor that these factories that now operate with hydroelectric power obtained from the Niagara Falls companies could operate just as well and perhaps just as cheaply with coal, except perhaps they would have to change the organization of their plants. That is true to a large extent. But there is one company up there which could not operate with the power generated by coal, and that is the largest consumer of this power, the consumer who pays the least for it, the Aluminum Co. of North America.

And now I want briefly to review here the history of that company. It could not pay a cent in dividends if it did not have this water power. It owns some small water-power propositions on the Little Tennessee River, which I do not think it utilizes as yet. But if numerous bills, heretofore the subject of much discussion, ever pass they will be able to assemble enough power to establish there a most valuable plant. Aluminum is made out of bauxite, a sort of clay that is dug out of the ground in Arkansas and can be found also down here in Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama. This company, the Aluminum Co. of America, has acquired its tremendous holdings and pays its tremendous dividends on account of the fact that we have been generous and have given away the power that can be generated there at Niagara Falls without any recompense to this Government.

Prior to 12 or 15 years ago aluminum was almost a precious metal. At that time Prof. Hall discovered a method of making aluminum in electric ovens, and you must have hydroelectric power to do this. Aluminum ware is now manufactured and sold everywhere throughout the world. His discovery resulted in tremendous good to mankind, but his patents were acquired by the Aluminum Co. of America, starting in under the title of the Pittsburgh Reduction Co., operating up here at Pittsburgh.

This company started in 12 or 15 years ago with a cash investment of $20,000. They never invested another dollar in cash, not one; and to-day they are a $30,000,000 corporation. They paid in 1912 15 per cent in dividends on a capitalization of $30,000,000. In 1913 they paid a dividend of 17 per cent on a capitalization of $30,000,000.

I propose to put into the RECORD here the examination of Mr. Davis, the general manager of that company, before the Committee on Ways and Means of this House. On the cross-examination conducted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Palmer, unfortunately for the country not now a Member of this House, and myself, the facts were developed which I propose now to relate. That gentleman, Mr. Davis, admitted that on the actual cash invested by this company, this company was distributing in 1913—I presume its dividends are much larger now—from 180 per cent to 225 per cent each year. The patents have expired, but the Aluminum Co. of America now control the aluminum business of all the world, and they do it in this way. Their story reads like a tale from the Arabian Nights. I do not know what has become of Prof. Hall, who is entitled to the credit of this invention. I presume he received a small compensation and then went out of the business. Here are the facts with reference to the control of the aluminum industry of the world by this aluminum company, as developed in this cross-examination under the admissions of its own general manager: A few years ago aluminum companies, based on the American patents, were organized in France and in Switzerland, and in Norway and in England. In southern France there are the most splendid water-power possibilities anywhere in the world except at Niagara Falls. A world-trust agreement was prepared by the London representative of the American Aluminum Co. and the manager of the American Aluminum Co. The American Aluminum Co. own the Canadian Aluminum Co. also. He admitted that the agreement was to control world prices. All the 11 aluminum companies in the world are under this agreement to control prices the world over, except in the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is not that an illegal combination?

Mr. RAINEY. I will come to that presently.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If it is, they ought to be prosecuted.

Mr. RAINEY. They escaped the antitrust laws of this country by not including the American Aluminum Co., and after they had prepared this contract they submitted it to the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Wickersham, to know whether it violated in any way the antitrust laws of the United States, and he said it did not. In response to my questions the manager of the Aluminum Co. of America stated that the only reason why they did not include the United States in this agreement was that to have done so would have been in violation of our own antitrust laws. But the agreement was prepared here and prepared by him. It was entered into by his Canadian company and by all the other companies in the world, and so under an agreement made here, approved by the Attorney General of the United States, omitting from its terms the United States company itself, it controls the price of aluminum the world over. This situation has been made possible by the fact that we have given away to these companies, without any recompense whatever, or, rather, we have permitted them to steal from our rivers, the only great national asset we now have.

Under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I herewith incorporate extracts from the examination of Mr. Arthur V. Davis, representing the Aluminum Co. of America, of Pittsburgh, Pa., conducted before the Ways and Means Committee of this House in January, 1913, which can be found on pages 1486 to 1509, inclusive, of Volume II, schedule C, of the Tariff hearings conducted before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives during the third session of the Sixty-second Congress.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. PALMER. But a large number of customers are willing to pay them, and they are willing to buy the foreign product, are they not? Are you not to-day the largest importers of foreign aluminum?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. You mean the largest single importer?

Mr. PALMER. Well, yes.

Mr. DAVIS. We might be, but by no means equal to the aggregate. I should like to explain, Mr. Palmer, if I may, in regard to the metal business. You will remember, perhaps, the remark made by Andrew Carnegie, who said, "The metal business is always either a feast or a famine." And that is very true. The only unfortunate part about it is that the famines last for many years and the feasts last for only a few months.

* * * * *

Mr. PALMER. How much is your capital?

Mr. DAVIS. Our capital invested is about $30,000,000, a large portion of which is reinvested profits. I anticipated your next question.

Mr. PALMER. I was trying to start with the right figures. Is it not nearer $35,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Shall I give you the exact figures?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; if you have them there.

Mr. DAVIS. The capital, as it stands on our books at the end of this month—the end of December; I should say last December—is just a shade over $30,000,000.

Mr. PALMER. Have you charged something off since the last year or two years?

Mr. DAVIS. We charged quite a lot off year before last.

Mr. PALMER. Have you reduced your surplus in any way?

Mr. DAVIS. We charged quite a lot off year before last.

Mr. PALMER. How much was your total capital and surplus then?

Mr. DAVIS. $26,000,000 at the end of last year and $30,000,000 at the end of the year before.

Mr. PALMER. Is that the largest that your capital and surplus have reached?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. $30,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Or thereabouts?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. How long has the Aluminum Co. of America been in business?

Mr. DAVIS. It has been in business since 1890 on its present basis.

Mr. PALMER. As the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. How long has the Aluminum Co. of America been in business?

Mr. DAVIS. Perhaps if I may explain it in my own way, I can give you what you wish.

Mr. PALMER. Perhaps we can do better in this way, because I want to save time. This business was started as the Pittsburgh Reduction Co.?

Mr. DAVIS. The Pittsburgh Reduction Co. was started in 1888, and the company merely changed its name without undergoing any other change as to its finances or condition whatever.

Mr. PALMER. What was the capital of the Pittsburgh Reduction Co.?

Mr. DAVIS. The capital of the original Pittsburgh Reduction Co. was $20,000.

Mr. PALMER. How much of that was cash?

Mr. DAVIS. That was all cash. That company was, however, merely an experimental company. It was a company which was to exploit or test aluminum patents, a patented process, with the agreement that if, at the expiration of a reasonable time, it was decided to continue the manufacture of aluminum under this process that a company should be formed of $1,000,000 capitalization, so the original $20,000 can really be ignored, because it really had no existence except temporarily.

Mr. PALMER. And the $1,000,000 corporation was the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. DAVIS. No. The $1,000,000 company was still the Pittsburgh Reduction Co., and that was about in 1890.

Mr. PALMER. How much of that $1,000,000 was cash?

Mr. DAVIS. I can not give you that exact figure. It was all either cash or patents.

Mr. PALMER. How much of it was patents?

Mr. DAVIS. I can not give you that exact figure; I do not remember the exact percentage. I have seen your statement, however, in which you state it was some $700,000, but that is much too large a figure. I am sure it was very much less than that.

Mr. PALMER. Well, the Government in its bill against the Aluminum Co. of America averred that of the original capital of $1,000,000, $10,000 was paid for in cash, $250,000 was to be paid as called for, and the entire balance, $720,000, was estimated as the value of certain letters patent issued to Charles M. Hall, covering the process for making aluminum. Was that averment true?

Mr. DAVIS. I should say that averment was just as true as any other averment in the bill. There was not a single averment in the bill, except merely categorical statements, that was true at all.

Mr. PALMER. Did you deny that in your answer?

Mr. DAVIS. I think we did.

Mr. PALMER. What is the truth, then?

Mr. DAVIS. The truth is, we had a $1,000,000 capitalization, of which a certain portion was given to Mr. Hall, the patentee.

Mr. PALMER. Was it as much as $720,000?

Mr. DAVIS. I am sure it was nothing like that, although I was not familiar with the business at that time, and I do not know just how much it was; and I might say that the books do not show it—the books we have at the present time. I looked to see whether they did show that, but I could not ascertain it.

Mr. PALMER. How long did the capital continue at $1,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. For a number of years, when we increased the capital to $1,600,000 by issuing $600,000 of preferred stock for $600,000 in cash. The capital then remained at $1,600,000 for another period of years, when we issued $2,200,000 more of common stock, making the total of common-stock capitalization $2,200,000, and of this $2,200,000, $1,200,000 was for cash and $1,000,000 was a stock dividend.

Mr. PALMER. $1,200,000 was cash?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes sir; and $1,000,000 was a stock dividend. And then at the expiration of our patents—our patents expired in 1909—or at the end, I think, of 1908, we capitalized the earnings which we had always left in the company, because we paid little or no dividends during all those years; we declared a stock dividend and authorized the issuance of $20,000,000 worth of stock, but only $18,750,000 is issued.

Mr. PALMER. Is that all that has been issued?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. And since that time you have accumulated a surplus of about $12,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Not since that time. We did not declare it all in the form of a stock dividend, but what the surplus was I can not just state now.

Mr. PALMER. But the undivided profits which you had at that time?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; and the undivided profits since then.

Mr. PALMER. And you have accumulated since then a surplus amounting to about $12,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. So that you now have a $30,000,000 capitalization on which you are earning dividends?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. And those dividends are how much on the capital stock?

Mr. DAVIS. We pay 4 per cent on the capital stock.

Mr. PALMER. Four per cent?

Mr. DAVIS. Four per cent; yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. How much did you earn in 1912?

Mr. DAVIS. In 1912 about 15 per cent.

Mr. PALMER. On the $30,000 000?

Mr. DAVIS. On the investment; yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. On the total capital?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. How much did you earn in 1911?

Mr. DAVIS. About 17 per cent. That is before we made this large writing off that I spoke of. I do not know just what that would have brought it down to.

Mr. PALMER. How much did you earn before that?

Mr. DAVIS. About the same.

Mr. PALMER. It has been running about 15 per cent, 17 per cent, and 18 per cent.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. So that if the Government's averments were correct, which you say are not exactly correct, though you can not give the exact figures, the amount of cash that has actually been contributed to your company is only $1,810,000 outside of the earned profits?

Mr. DAVIS. If the averment of the Government is correct that would be correct; yes, sir. No; pardon me. I think that is wrong.

Mr. PALMER. I have $1,200,000; that is the first item which you gave me; $600,000 in preferred and $10,000 cash.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. PALMER. In the original investment; making altogether $1,810.000.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. All the rest of this $30,000,000, assuming the Government's averment as to the origin of your company as correct, was earned profits?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. And that $1,810,000 is about——

Mr. DAVIS (interposing). I should think it might be just as well if you would calculate on the basis which we estimate is somewhere near correct rather than to calculate on the basis that the Government figures, which we contend is incorrect.

Mr. PALMER. But you can not give me your figures?

Mr. DAVIS. No.

Mr. PALMER. And in the absence of your figures I am bound to take the Government's averment as being approximately correct, because we can not get any figures to change that averment.

Mr. DAVIS. You are familiar, I think, with the ordinary method of filing a bill, and I think you must admit that there are many averments made in a bill that are not very seriously considered, even by those who make the averments.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose we give you the benefit of, say, $190,000 as being an excess estimate of the amount for which the patent was turned in. That would still leave $2,000,000 of actual cash money invested in the concern.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, if you should take the original $1,000,000 it does not make a great deal of difference, and assuming that $750,000 of that was cash and $250,000 of it was for the patents——

Mr. PALMER (interposing). You would come nearer to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I think so; yes, sir. I think I would like to change that and say $600,000 cash and $400,000. That, perhaps, is nearer my conception.

Mr. PALMER. Even so, the present capital and surplus are from 12 to 15 times the amount of money which was actually paid into the concern.

Mr. DAVIS. Somewhere near that.

Mr. PALMER. So when you earn 15 per cent on your $30,000,000 you are earning from 180 per cent to 225 per cent on the actual money which was invested in your plant?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. That is about correct, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS. I have not checked the figures, but I have no doubt they are correct.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PALMER. Have you not as much as 90 per cent of the bauxite supply in this country?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Seventy-five per cent?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think so; no, sir. I will answer that positively; no, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Where is your bauxite?

Mr. DAVIS. Our bauxite is most altogether in Arkansas.

Mr. PALMER. That is where all of the bauxite is, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. There is a great deal in Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee.

Mr. PALMER. Where those States corner is where the bauxite is?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; the bauxite of those States.

Mr. PALMER. Is there bauxite elsewhere in this country?

Mr. DAVIS. In Arkansas; yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. You do not know what proportion of it you have?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. The Government averred in its suit against you that you had 90 per cent of it.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. And did you deny that?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Did you answer as to how much you had?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; we do not know. We know approximately how much we have ourselves, and we know of a great many deposits that we do not own.

Mr. PALMER. Are they commercially valuable or being used commercially now?

Mr. DAVIS. No; they are not being used commercially, but they are commercially valuable. At least the owners seem to think they are pretty valuable.

Mr. PALMER. How do you know that?

Mr. DAVIS. Because they have asked us to purchase from them.

Mr. PALMER. You have been trying to get them?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; they have asked us to purchase them.

Mr. PALMER. But they are holding them for too much money?

Mr. DAVIS. They are holding them for more than we think they are worth.

Mr. PALMER. What proportion of the bauxite beds which are being commercially used have you got in this country?

Mr. DAVIS. That are actually being operated?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Quite a large portion of them.

Mr. PALMER. Does that run into 90 per cent?

Mr. DAVIS. It might.

Mr. PALMER. The only reason the other bauxite beds are not being used commercially is because there is nobody to sell it to except the Aluminum Co. of America; is not that right?

Mr. DAVIS. That is true to a large extent; that is not absolutely true; no, sir. There is nobody to sell it to in the United States of America to make aluminum out of it except the Aluminum Co. of America, but there is a very large amount of bauxite which is mined and sold to make alum out of, with which we have nothing to do.

Mr. PALMER. That is not large in proportion to the amount used by you, is it?

Mr. DAVIS. I have a figure here which I think I can give you.

Mr. PALMER. What is the proportion?

Mr. DAVIS. I think I have that figure here. In the year 1911 the bauxite which we ourselves shipped to the alum trade was about 46 per cent of the amount which we used ourselves in making aluminum. In addition to what we ourselves sold to the alum trade there was a very substantial amount sold by other people to the alum trade, but as to the exact amount I have no information.

Mr. PALMER. You sold more to the alum trade than the other people, did you not?

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is quite likely. When I say "we sold to the alum trade," I refer to the Republic Mining & Manufacturing Co., which is our company. It mines bauxite for the alum trade.

Mr. PALMER. Are you trying now to buy more bauxite beds?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. You are negotiating with the owners of the beds?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Are you trying also to build more water-power plants?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Your present plants are at Niagara Falls, and where else?

Mr. DAVIS. At Niagara Falls and Massena, New York State. We are going to build, if we are permitted to go ahead, if we are not crushed out by the new tariff, a plant on our rather large water power which we have in North Carolina and Tennessee, and it is in order to provide that plant with sufficient bauxite that we are negotiating for supplies of bauxite, for we have only enough bauxite, in our opinion, as a reserve, for a plant of our present size.

Mr. PALMER. Are those water-power plants in North Carolina and Tennessee being developed by you now?

Mr. DAVIS. We are going to start to develop them right away, we expect.

Mr. PALMER. You have not yet built the power plants there?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. We have just finished gathering together the necessary riparian rights.

Mr. PALMER. Are you engaged in that same effort elsewhere?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. In other States?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Are you not interested in water powers, the promoters of which are endeavoring to secure legislation from Congress?

Mr. DAVIS. We purchased several years ago riparian rights on the St. Lawrence River and formed a company called the Long Saulte Development Co. If Congress, by the way, had given us an opportunity to develop this water power, we would, no doubt, have a sufficient supply of aluminum now to supply all the demands, so that, so far as Congress is concerned, we think it is invidious for them to refuse us an opportunity to go ahead on this water power and at the same time blame us for not supplying the market with aluminum.

Mr. PALMER. Perhaps Congress did not know it was your water power?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; I told them so myself.

Mr. PALMER. Are there other water-power developments for which the promoters are trying to secure legislation in your interest?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; no others.

Mr. PALMER. Is that the only one?

Mr. DAVIS. That is absolutely the only one. I had the pleasure of speaking to the present chairman about that point the other day, in which I endeavored to explain to him about the water power in Tennessee, on the Clinch River, which it had been said we proposed establishing and with which we had some connection. But we know nothing at all about it and have no connection with it.

Mr. RAINEY. You have some water power on the Little Tennessee River, have you not?

Mr. DAVIS. That is in connection with our development in North Carolina.

Mr. RAINEY. And that is not very far from the Clinch River?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know where the Clinch River is.

Mr. RAINEY. It is right there; just a few miles away.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, we have no connection with it. We own one water power at Massena, N. Y., called the St Lawrence River Power Co. That is a company which we bought after it was developed some years ago. Then we purchased these riparian rights that I spoke of on the St. Lawrence River, and incorporated the company called the Long Saulte Development Co., and applied to Congress for the right to develop that power, and we were refused. And thinking it impossible at the present time to do anything with this water power we turned our attention to the Little Tennessee River, and have just finished getting together these riparian rights on the Little Tennessee River. So the undeveloped water powers which we have are this Long Saulte Development and this Little Tennessee proposition.

Mr. PALMER. There is no other water power over which you are now seeking control?

Mr. DAVIS. No; absolutely none.

Mr. PALMER. Have you not used as an excuse in writing to several of your customers, who demanded more aluminum than you were willing to let them have, that you have not been able to get legislation through for various projects for water-power development?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; we only have the one case, the Long Saulte Development Co.

Mr. PALMER. Have you not used that as an excuse to your customers?

Mr. DAVIS. That is not an excuse; it is a fact.

Mr. PALMER. Do you mean you have only had one development?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. We only have one development, but I can not say we have positively said it was one or two. We may not have disclosed our plans very fully in each individual letter. I can not say. But that is the only water power that we have.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DAVIS. Our connection with the foreign trade, aluminum trade, is that several years ago, I think about 1899, we built a plant in Canada, on the St. Lawrence River, at a place called Shawanigan Falls. We have been sometimes rather sorry we built that plant, but we felt at that time it was advisable to do it on account of the patent situation. The plant, which is known as the Northern Aluminum Co., and the capital stock of which we own, is selling a portion of its product in Europe.

Mr. PALMER. Have you any connection with foreign aluminum manufacturers on the Continent?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Have you had contracts with those foreign aluminum manufacturers relative to the disposal of their output?

Mr. DAVIS. You mean the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. PALMER. Well, or any of your other companies.

Mr. DAVIS. The Northern Aluminum Co. has; yes, sir; but the Aluminum Co. of America has not.

Mr. PALMER. Those contracts refer to the sale of the European product?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; the sale of the product. But they have no relation whatever to the United States. Every foreign producer is free to import into the United States without regard to these contracts, and the Aluminum Co. of America is, of course, equally free to export.

Mr. PALMER. Then your only contract is between your Canadian company and the European companies?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Which prevents the European companies from importing into Canada—is that the contract?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; that is not the nature of the contract.

Mr. PALMER. What is it?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, the companies agree to subject themselves to certain rules of a committee, both with respect to price and quantity of output, and so forth.

Mr. PALMER. This agreement prevents competition between your Canadian plant and the foreign manufacturers?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Is it successful in preventing that competition?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. There is no importing of aluminum into Canada to compete with your Canadian people?

Mr. DAVIS. That is not exactly the way the contract operates. Everybody is free to sell wherever they please; I mean the markets are not divided one to one party and one to another.

Mr. PALMER. What is this agreement? To keep an established price?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; practically that.

Mr. PALMER. Well, that kills competition, of course?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; so far as price is concerned; but, as I say, that contract has no relation whatever to the United States, and so far as the United States business is concerned it is a decided detriment from our standpoint?

Mr. PALMER. Why?

Mr. DAVIS. Because these people have got a certain amount of surplus to dump and this is the only place to dump it, the United States, and that is where they send it.

Mr. PALMER. What companies are connected with your Canadian company in a contract? Where do they operate?

Mr. DAVIS. There is a company in Italy; a Swiss company, with plants in Switzerland, Germany, and Austria; two companies, I think, in Norway; some five or six companies in France; two companies in England; and another company in Switzerland independent of the one first spoken of. I think that is all.

Mr. PALMER. That comprises about all the aluminum manufacturers on the Continent?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; all aluminum manufacturers on the Continent.

Mr. PALMER. Then your Canadian company has a contract with all of the aluminum manufacturers?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Which contract regulates the prices?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. What is the price in Canada to-day?

Mr. DAVIS. The price in Canada to-day?

Mr. PALMER. Yes. Is it the same as it is here?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; the same as it is in England or Italy. Just now it is abnormally high. It has averaged about 12 or 14 cents until just within the last two or three months.

Mr. PALMER. Is there real competition abroad between these various companies which you have mentioned?

Mr. DAVIS. There has been.

Mr. PALMER. Is there now?

Mr. DAVIS. Not now; no, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Why not?

Mr. DAVIS. On account of this contract that I speak of.

Mr. PALMER. Well, I mean in the foreign market; is there real competition?

Mr. DAVIS. This contract covers the foreign market.

Mr. PALMER. As well as the Canadian market?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. And the only other territory, then, so far as you are concerned, is the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; as far as we are concerned.

Mr. PALMER. Did you make an effort at the time to have the United States included within that agreement?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. PALMER. Why not?

Mr. DAVIS. It was against the Sherman law.

Mr. PALMER. Against the Sherman law for a company in America to make an agreement with a European company?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I am not enough of a lawyer to tell whether it might be so construed, but we wanted to be absolutely on the safe side and be absolutely a law-abiding company. So we not only made no attempt to make an agreement——

Mr. PALMER (interposing). You made up your mind that you would do nothing that could possibly be construed as a violation of the laws of the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. But you have a pretty accurate understanding with those companies over there about the price at all times, have you not?

Mr. DAVIS. Absolutely none, sir. If we had, we would consider that we would be violating the law. I do not think there is a great deal of difference between a secret contract and a written one.

Mr. PALMER. They have made a contract for all the European markets and the Canadian markets between all the manufacturers of aluminum except yourselves, and you now say you are practically competing against a combination which is world-wide?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; because none of these companies have any—you mean competing in the United States?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; because none of these companies have any connection with each other, so far as the United States is concerned. Each of them operates quite independently and without the knowledge of the others at all.

Mr. PALMER. And with no understanding about price?

Mr. DAVIS. Absolutely none.

Mr. PALMER. Is there, in fact, any competition as to price for the American market as between those European companies?

Mr. DAVIS. Absolutely the most open and free, and from every standpoint the most virulent.

Mr. PALMER. Which companies are able to sell the cheapest, the French companies?

Mr. DAVIS. I believe the French people are in a better position; they are in a very much better position than some of the others on account of the fact that they have a 7½-cent tariff, so that the other foreign competitors are obliged to meet their tariff before they can compete wih them in their own market.

Mr. PALMER. They make a great deal more aluminum than their own market consumes, do they not?

Mr. DAVIS. Very much.

Mr. PALMER. And they make it cheaper than you can make it?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. So the tariff does not do them any good? Their tariff does not do them any good?

Mr. DAVIS. It prevents anybody from sending in metal as a reprisal. I have mentioned that point in my brief, but my recollection is that they have a capacity for about 45,000,000 pounds and they use 6,000,000 pounds only; all the rest of it is exported, so that the French people are really the people that we have to fear, not only because they are in the best position from a manufacturing standpoint, but because they have such a tremendous output as compared to their home markets that they must export it and——

Mr. PALMER (interposing). And they are in a good position because their bauxite and their water powers are very close together.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; their bauxite is 63 per cent of aluminum as compared to ours of 52 and 55, and they are very close to their water powers and their water powers are very good and cheap.

Mr. PALMER. You will be in a very much better condition to compete with them when you get your Tennessee and North Carolina water powers operating nearer your bauxite, will you not?

Mr. DAVIS. We will be in a somewhat better position; yes, sir; just that much better position.

Mr. PALMER. Now, there is just another point. How many different subsidiary companies has the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. DAVIS. It has a good many.

Mr. PALMER. What are they?

Mr. DAVIS. When we readjusted our business at the expiration of our patents we subdivided our various manufacturing businesses into separate corporations. Our bauxite business we put into the hands of a company called the American Bauxite Co. Our alumina business we put into the hands of a company called the Alumina Ore Co. Alumina is the second step in the manufacture of aluminum.

Mr. PALMER. It is refined bauxite?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; and a very highly finished product. Our carbon business we put into a company called the Electric Carbon Co., and our finished-goods business, our rolling mills and stamp factories, etc., we put into a company called the United States Aluminum Co. We already had the Northern Aluminum Co., of Canada, of which I have just spoken. These are our principal operating companies, and they are really what you might call incorporated departments, as you can see. In addition to that, we have acquired, in one way or another, some few rather unimportant companies. For instance, at Massena we have a real estate company which we call the Pine Grove Realty Co.; and we operate the lighting of the town from our Massena power house, and of course have to have an electric-light company. But these other companies are quite trivial.

Mr. PALMER. You have taken over some bauxite companies, have you not?

Mr. DAVIS. The Republic Mining & Manufacturing Co.

Mr. PALMER. Are those companies owned exclusively by the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. You own all the stock?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. And is the Aluminum Co. of America simply a holding company?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; the Aluminum Co. is both the operating company and the holding company. The Aluminum Co. of America makes all of the aluminum.

Mr. PALMER. In the profits which you have given—earnings of 15 and 16 per cent on $30,000,000—do you include all the earnings of these subsidiary companies?

Mr. DAVIS. All the earnings.

Mr. PALMER. Or simply the dividends paid on the stock of these subsidiary companies?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; none of the subsidiary companies pay any dividends. As a matter of fact, since we formed these companies we may have once or twice paid a dividend, but only in an incidental way. These earnings that I referred to are the aggregate earnings of all the companies put together.

Mr. PALMER. How do those earnings get into the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. DAVIS. They are held as surplus by the other companies. You see, we only pay 4 per cent dividend, and we can get cash enough for that dividend out of the earnings of the Aluminum Co. of America.

Mr. PALMER. But in figuring this 15 per cent on $30,000,000 you are not including simply the dividends paid on the stock of the subsidiary companies, but the gross earnings.

Mr. DAVIS. The gross earnings of all the companies.

Mr. PALMER. The net earnings of the subsidiary companies?

Mr. DAVIS. The aggregate net earnings of all the companies as applied against the aggregate capital of all the companies.

Mr. PALMER. What do you call your sales company?

Mr. DAVIS. The sales company is really the Aluminum Co. of America. We make a division of our business at the ingot. The Aluminum Co. of America smelts the ore into aluminum and sells it. If the process is carried further and we roll the ingot aluminum into sheets or into rods or draw it into wire, or make it into any kind of a finished article, that further fabrication is done by the United States Aluminum Co., and it theoretically sells its own product, the same as the Aluminum Co. of America sells its own product, but practically speaking the salesmen consider themselves salesmen for all of the companies and we do not draw any distinction. The distinction between these companies is really a bookkeeping distinction and not an operating distinction.

Mr. PALMER. Are the earnings of this selling company, this United States Aluminum Co., also included within these earnings that you have given us?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; the earnings of every description.

Mr. PALMER. I think that is all.

Mr. RAINEY. You do not anticipate that French bauxite can penetrate very far into this country, do you?

Mr. DAVIS. French bauxite, at the present time, goes in large quantities to Pittsburgh. That is the farthest that I know it goes.

Mr. RAINEY. And that is as far as you expect it to go, on account of the freight rates?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. These foreign companies do not control the bauxite deposits in France and in the other countries where bauxite is found, do they?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. I understand the situation to be that you own the Canadian company?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. And the Canadian company controls the foreign companies?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; the Canadian company controls no companies.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, it has an agreement with all of the other foreign companies?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. And your company in Canada has a perfect agreement with all the foreign companies?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. Of course, you do not expect your Canadian company to furnish much competition, do you?

Mr. DAVIS. In this country?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; naturally not.

Mr. RAINEY. And on account of the agreement of your Canadian company with all of these other foreign companies you would not expect the foreign companies to furnish much competition for you, would you?

Mr. DAVIS. We not only expect it, but we have it. As I tried to explain, this agreement distinctly excludes the United States, and every company under the agreement is at perfect liberty to sell as much as it pleases in the United States and at whatever price it pleases.

Mr. RAINEY. Including the Canadian company?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes; of course, including the Canadian company.

Mr. RAINEY. You do not expect them to do it, do you?

Mr. DAVIS No; we naturally do not expect them to do a great deal; but there are, I think, 11 other companies, which are free to import into the United States, and the figures show that they do import into the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. But you buy all of their importations?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; by no means.

Mr. RAINEY. Except what is taken by the alum trade. You buy all the rest of it? You buy all that is used in the manufacture of the metal, do you not?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I think you are getting, perhaps, a little mixed between bauxite and aluminum.

Mr. RAINEY. I am talking about aluminum now.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; these foreign manufacturers of aluminum ship their product into the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. And you buy it all?

Mr DAVIS. No, sir; we buy but very little. We have had enough of our own except during the last two or three months, during this unprecedented demand; and as soon as these present contracts are over we do not expect to buy any more. But during all of these years there has been a heavy importation into the United States direct from these foreign producers to consumers here. We have nothing whatever to do with that.

Mr. RAINEY. Water power is quite an important item in the production of aluminum, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. The water-power sites in southern France do not amount to very much, do they?

Mr. DAVIS. They are the best in the world, in my opinion, unless you exclude, perhaps, Norway.

Mr. RAINEY. Better than Niagara Falls?

Mr DAVIS. Yes, sir; on an average. Niagara Falls must be taken as a case by itself.

Mr. RAINEY. Better than your proposed plant up on the St. Lawrence River?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. Well, I do not know that they are better than that plant; I would not say they were better.

Mr. RAINEY. Then you have two water-power plants that are better than they have in France?

Mr. DAVIS. We do not own any water power at Niagara Falls; we buy power from the power company at Niagara Falls, and our power on the St. Lawrence River we can not develop, so it does not do us much good. The only power we can develop at the present time is the water power on the Little Tennessee River, and that is by no means equal to the water-power plants in either France or Norway?

Mr. RAINEY. I believe that is all.

Mr. HILL. Does your Canadian company, which you own, agree with the European companies as to the price at which the metal shall be sold in Europe only?

Mr. DAVIS. In Europe only. In Europe and Canada.

Mr. HILL. Then it does not affect any other country in the world?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. HILL. The European companies can sell in any other country except Canada and at any price they please?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; you misunderstood me. The agreement covers all of the world except the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. And the only reason why it does not cover the United States is because we have a law here which prevents it?

Mr. DAVIS. I must admit, perhaps, that is a fair way of putting it.

Mr. PALMER. But the United States has a bigger demand than you can supply?

Mr. DAVIS. The United States has had a bigger demand for the past two or three months than we can supply, but for the last years it has had a very much smaller demand than we could supply; and if the conditions go back again, as they seem to be going, if December is to be repeated, the consumption of the United States can be supplied by us very easily. I should like to say that when we went into this boom we had such a heavy stock of aluminum that it actually frightened us, and we did not know exactly how we were going to come out with it. We had been stocking up for four years, and when a manufacturing company reaches that situation it is pretty serious.

Mr. RAINEY. Is it not true that your Canadian company and these foreign companies are on such amicable and friendly relations that it leads to a gentlemen's agreement by which the foreign companies will not interfere with you very much in the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. Absolutely not, sir. I have already answered that question to Mr. Palmer, and would like to reiterate it again to you, that there is absolutely nothing of the sort, and, in fact, just the reverse.

Mr. RAINEY. Does the fact that your Canadian company has a perfect agreement with all of the foreign companies produce a feeling of unfriendliness toward you?

Mr. DAVIS. It produces the keenest competition in this country, because this is the only country in which they can sell. The old saying is that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it." Now, the matter of fact is that they imported into this country last year 30 per cent of what we make, which does not look as though there was very much of a gentlemen's agreement.

Mr. HILL. They do not send the aluminum here and put it on sale? It is bought over there, and if it is bought over there it is bought under European terms, is it not?

* * * * * * *

Mr. RAINEY. What good does the contract that your company in Canada has with the foreign companies do you?

Mr. DAVIS. What good does it do the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. It does it no good.

Mr. RAINEY. Why not?

Mr. DAVIS. Because it affects the Northern Aluminum Co.

Mr. RAINEY. Your Canadian Company?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. And you own the Canadian company?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. I have already stated that.

Mr. RAINEY. And you say it does not help you?

Mr. DAVIS. Not as a manufacturing and selling proposition. It helps as far as our Canadian company is concerned, but not as a manufacturing and selling proposition.

Mr. RAINEY. You have such an agreement as takes you beyond the limitations of the Sherman law, have you not?

Mr. DAVIS. I beg your pardon?

Mr. RAINEY. Your arrangement with this Canadian company and the foreign companies is such that you think you have escaped the penalties of the Sherman law?

Mr. DAVIS. That agreement has nothing whatever to do with this country, as I have stated. The fact that these people are coming into this market and fighting us tooth and nail is enough to take us out of the provisions of the Sherman Act. We have no agreement or arrangement, and nothing about this agreement or arrangement affects the United States in any way, shape, or form, except that I think it makes competition more brisk here than it otherwise would be.

Mr. RAINEY. Are there any foreign companies shipping aluminum to purchasers in the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. Every one of them.

Mr. RAINEY. I thought you just told Mr. Hill that purchasers here went over there and bought from them according to your Canadian agreement.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. The brokers buy over there and they sell over here. But the largest portion of this material that is imported into this country is sold by New York brokers who have bought on their own account or who act as agents. Sometimes it is one way and sometimes it is another.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DIXON. Have you a copy of that agreement with you?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. DIXON. You would not like to make that a part of the record?

Mr. DAVIS. I would have no objection myself, but I think perhaps the other people to the agreement would object. I should like to say in regard to this agreement that I submitted the proposed form of agreement to Mr. Wickersham, and when the agreement was signed I sent him a copy of the signed agreement.

Mr. PALMER. Why did you do that?

Mr. DAVIS. I wanted to be absolutely open and aboveboard with Mr. Wickersham.

Mr. PALMER. He had no jurisdiction over all the rest of the world?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; he had not.

Mr. RAINEY. The agreement between your Canadian company and foreign companies you submitted to our Attorney General?

Mr. DAVIS. I sent it to him in order that he might be absolutely cognizant of all the facts.

Mr. RAINEY. Then you made the contract yourself between the Canadian company and the foreign companies?

Mr. DAVIS. Our London representative and myself made the agreement.

Mr. RAINEY. That is all.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that point.

Mr. KEATING. Not while this bill is pending.

Mr. FLOOD. We will pass the bill over. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object to that.

Mr. KEATING. Then, I insist on my point.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like very much to pass this resolution, and it is exceedingly important that it be passed now; but I realize the fact that there is not a quorum in the city, and if the gentleman insists upon the point of no quorum, I will withdraw this bill and let it go until after the holidays.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object to the withdrawal.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. HOWARD. I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he will not withdraw his objection to the request made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs? The vocational education bill, a matter in which our section as well as the entire country is greatly interested, will follow this bill immediately, as I understand it.

Mr. FLOOD. No; the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill will follow.

Mr. HOWARD. And the vocational education bill will follow the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman from Colorado to withhold his point just a moment, until I can request unanimous consent——

Mr. KEATING. I have no objection to withdrawing the point of no quorum so far as these other bills are concerned. My only desire is not to have a vote on the Niagara power bill to-day.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some observations by Arthur MacDonald.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting some observations of Arthur MacDonald. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the privilege of extending my remarks.

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Illinois is that he may extend his remarks by printing some kind of a document prepared by Arthur MacDonald.

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Colorado has made the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. He withheld it to allow the gentleman from Illinois to make his request. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to suggest to my colleague that if a matter of that sort is to be printed at all, instead of being printed in the RECORD it ought to be printed as a House document. He ought to introduce a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Printing, and I am going to object to inserting it in the RECORD, in the hope that my colleague will offer a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and that is the end of it.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement from the Internal-Revenue Office giving certain figures about internal-revenue collections which I think will be of great value to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by including some kind of a document prepared by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. It is a short document, I suppose?

Mr. McKELLAR. About two columns, not to exceed three.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Both the gentleman from Colorado and the gentleman from South Carolina make the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I did not make the point of no quorum; I objected to the withdrawal of this particular resolution from the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Colorado withholds it for the present, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from consideration this resolution so that we may go on with the diplomatic bill.

DIVERSION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution relating to diversion of the waters of Niagara from consideration.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This matter now being before the House in the regular order, is it not the unfinished business of the House when the House adjourns, and will it not be the unfinished business when the House meets again? Will it not continue as unfinished business until displaced by some parliamentary action?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. MANN. I think we had better dispose of it now. It could never be called up again except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That is true, and the gentleman from Illinois objects to the withdrawal of the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Colorado to withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. He merely withheld it. The Chair has not put the request of the gentleman from Virginia. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado to withhold his point of no quorum for two minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I am perfectly willing to withhold the point of no quorum in order to give the gentleman an opportunity to make a statement; but here is the point, I am not in a position to withdraw the point of no quorum in order to permit legislation affecting valuable water power.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado withhold it?

Mr. KEATING. I withhold it for two minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say to the gentleman from Colorado, who has threatened the point of no quorum, that as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I felt a good deal as he feels when the bill came over from the Senate, terminating by the terms of it on the 1st of June. But that has been amended by making it run a shorter time, now expiring 4th of March next. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has been considering for six years legislation dealing with this question, and it has proceeded very far. The bill is almost perfected. It regulates the rates, fixes the compensation, and is one of the most progressive pieces of legislation dealing with the water-power question that has been considered by any committee. This provision in this resolution can not run beyond the 4th of March, and without revealing anything that has taken place in the committee, the sense of the committee has been tested, and we propose to bring out a bill for permanent legislation for the consideration of the House by the 15th of January. Under the rules of the House the next committee after the Committee on Agriculture that has the call of the calendar is the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and we will have two calendar Wednesdays some time in the month of January for the consideration of that bill. I am sure that when the bill comes before the House it will obtain the support of the gentleman from Colorado, who is always for progressive legislation.

Now, the situation up there is serious. Here is water power that has been coming over from Canada under the terms of the treaty giving life to industry on this side, and because of certain exigencies which have arisen in Canada it is now prohibited, and these plants that have been obtaining power from Canada for the purpose of running street cars and lighting the cities will be stopped unless this bill is passed. That situation will confront the people.

Mr. KEATING. These companies have experienced no difficulty in getting the water in violation of law for a number of years. In all human probability they will go on and violate the law until Congress enacts legislation preventing it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. They can not do anything beyond the 4th of March.

Mr. KEATING. What is to prevent the Secretary of War from permitting these gentlemen from taking 20,000 cubic feet of water——

Mr. FLOOD. He has not the authority, and he will not violate the law.

Mr. KEATING. He has violated the law. If he can violate the law for 15,000 feet, he can violate it for 20,000 feet.

Mr. FLOOD. He did not know that he was violating the law, and he will not grant any permit that is in violation of law.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The Secretary of War came before the committee and stated that the first time he gave these companies the use of the power it was under a ruling by former Secretary of War Garrison, and he had followed the ruling without making any personal investigation himself. Subsequently he made an investigation and reached the decision that Secretary of War Garrison did not have the legal right, and under no situation would he hereafter grant a permit to use water illegally, but would ask for temporary legislation of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Here is part of the wording of the bill: "It shall in no case exceed the capacity of that generated by the permittee company." So there will be no new company created under this provision. It is because they obtain now the power from Canada and can not procure it any longer that this resolution is necessary. It is purely emergency legislation, strictly temporary with the period named. I hope the gentleman will not make his point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

The SPEAKER. The House must proceed regularly. The gentleman from Colorado made a point of order and withheld it temporarily. The Chair has no disposition to override him or disregard him, but if he wishes to make the point of order he must make it now.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. KEATING (interrupting). Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me for a moment, I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] may have two minutes and that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] may follow him.

Mr. MANN. That is not possible unless the point of order of no quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado withdraws his point.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado such time as he desires—that I may have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has 16 minutes left, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. FLOOD. How much time does the gentleman from Colorado desire?

Mr. KEATING. Just about five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield that time to the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I have withdrawn the point of order because certain distinguished gentlemen in the House, including the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], have assured me that this is a temporary permit, permitting the use of this water until the 4th of March; that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will, on the reconvening of Congress in January next, after the Christmas holidays, report to the House permanent legislation dealing with this subject; and, in addition, I have the assurance of the gentleman who represents the Buffalo district—Mr. SMITH—and other gentlemen on this side of the House that if permanent legislation is not enacted between the reconvening of Congress in January and the 4th of March they will call on the Secretary of War to shut off the water supply of these companies pending the passage of permanent legislation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is of the 4,400 extra cubic feet?

Mr. KEATING. No; the understanding is to shut off all; and, Mr. Speaker, I want the Representatives of the Buffalo district to rise here on the floor of this House and give that assurance to the Members of this House. I want the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs——

Mr. FLOOD. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. I shall repeat my statement for the benefit of the gentleman. I have said that you, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, promise to bring into the House permanent legislation respecting this matter when Congress reconvenes in January, and that if that legislation fails to pass, then you, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in charge of this legislation, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH], and the gentleman representing the Niagara Falls district [Mr. DEMPSEY], will accompany me on the 5th of March, and such other Members of Congress as may be interested, to the office of the Secretary of War, and there demand that the entire water supply be shut off from these companies until they get authority of law to use the water.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest doubt that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will report legislation dealing fully with this question, permanent legislation. My opinion is that the power companies that are using these 15,600 cubic feet of water per second are using it without authority of law, and if we do not enact permanent legislation I shall take great pleasure in going with the gentleman to the Secretary of War and stating my views and insisting that those companies ought to be cut off from the use of any water out of the Niagara River.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think that is an outrageous demand for any Member of Congress to make, and no such agreement ought to be entered into.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor.

Mr. FLOOD. It meets absolutely with my views on the question, and I shall be glad to accompany the gentleman to the Secretary of War and state my views.

Mr. MADDEN. If that agreement is entered into, I shall make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I shall now ask whether I have correctly stated the views of the gentleman from the Niagara Falls district [Mr. DEMPSEY]?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not correctly stated my views. I do not agree with the view that the Niagara Falls Power Co. has not the legal right to use the 15,600 cubic feet. They started to use that power under State authority, and as they supposed rightfully, and they have so continued to use it since that time. The question of whether or not they have the right to use it from the United States is a legal question about which there is much debate.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] got the floor. He is not using my time, is he?

The SPEAKER. He obtained the floor in the five minutes that the gentleman from Virginia yielded to the gentleman from Colorado. The gentleman from Colorado propounded a question to the gentleman from New York and he is trying to answer it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I think that it is a debatable question, a closely debatable question, whether or not the United States has given those power companies the right to use the 15,600 cubic feet. Personally I think they have the right. I would not have any right as a Representative of that district to say that I would ask them or ask the Secretary of War or ask anyone else to waive any rights that they have.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will pardon me, his explanation is quite sufficient, and I now make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. KEATING. No; it is unnecessary.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold his point.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is this a moving-picture show?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. Does the gentleman withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. KEATING. For the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Virginia to ask for a postponement of this measure.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said that he would yield me the floor; that he would withhold his point in order that I may be heard for five minutes upon the merits.

Mr. KEATING. It is useless to do that now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the further consideration of this measure be postponed until the 2d day of January, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the further consideration of this joint resolution be postponed until the 2d day of January.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the motion prevails when the House meets on the 2d day of January will this be the business before the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks——

Mr. FLOOD. I would ask to amend my motion by making it the 3d day of January.

Mr. MANN. That motion is not in order because the 3d day of January is Calendar Wednesday, and the House can not do that.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, the 4th day of January.

The SPEAKER. Answering the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry, if that motion prevails the Chair thinks that it is the duty of the Speaker the first thing after the reading of the Journal, and so forth, on the 4th day of January to declare this bill the unfinished business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless the motion is made to consider appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the consideration of appropriation bills is always in order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to postpone the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 186 until the 4th day of January.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

MILEAGE TO OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. Due to the fact that the employees of the House and Senate had to go home during the campaign, it seems to me this would be a very nice Christmas present to give them in order to afford them an opportunity to go home for the Christmas holidays, as the Members are at the present time doing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 66) authorizing the payment of mileage to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the resolution reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, and the Capitol police, borne on the annual and session rolls on the 4th day of December, 1916, mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile, each way, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in coming from and returning to their homes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FESS was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Moses Walton (H. R. 3955, 64th Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

OSAGE INDIAN SCHOOL, OKLAHOMA.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted there will be no opposition to the consideration of the bill which I now ask to have considered by the House——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to take anything for granted.

Mr. TILLMAN (continuing). So I will ask unanimous consent to take up the bill S. 6864.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill——

Mr. MANN. Where is the Senate copy. There is no use reading that unless the Clerk has the Senate engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER. Where is the official engrossed copy of this bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. I had supposed the Clerk had possession of it.

Mr. FLOOD. I think we had better go on with the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill in the meantime, Mr. Speaker, while they are hunting for that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 6864. An act to provide for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 10 years from January 1, 1917.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the third paragraph of section 4 of the act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stats. L., p. 539), is hereby amended to the extent that the moneys therein provided for support for Osage schools may be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for the same purposes as provided in said paragraph for a further period of not exceeding 10 years from the 1st day of January, 1917, on the condition of establishing vocational instruction in such schools.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Line 7, page 1, after the word "used," strike out the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior."

Line 10, page 1, strike out the words "not exceeding 10 years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

Line 1, page 2, after the word "seventeen," strike out the comma and the words "on the condition of establishing vocational instruction in such schools."

Amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "ten years," in the second line thereof, and inserting the words "one year."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as the bill itself is so drawn that it gives absolutely no indication whatever of what it means, I suggest the gentleman explain to the House, so it will get some intelligent idea of what it is about.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, for many years this Indian school has been conducted at Pawhuska, Okla. These Osage Indians are the wealthiest, per capita, of all the tribes. There are about 2,500 of them. There is a disposition upon the part of some of the Osages to close the school; others of the tribe desire it to be continued.

It is the desire of your Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate this school, with others, next summer. The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, recommends that the school be continued for 10 years. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT], in whose district this school is located, thinks it should be discontinued at once. The House Committee on Indian Affairs thinks that it ought to be continued for another year, in order to give this committee time to investigate as to whether it is desirable to continue it further. It does not involve an expenditure of a cent of Federal money. The school is financed from the funds of the Osage Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "An act providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of one year from January 1, 1917."

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19300.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19300) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, with Mr. ADAIR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19300, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19300) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a very brief statement in reference to this bill. I want to say that it carries an aggregate appropriation of $5,165,746.60. The current appropriation bill for the Diplomatic and Consular Service appropriated five million three hundred and fifty-five thousand and some odd dollars. We have reported in this bill one hundred and eighty-nine thousand and some odd dollars less than was appropriated in the bill for the same purpose for the current year.

A comparison of the estimates for 1918 with the law making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, follows:

Amount of estimates for 1918		5,700,626.66
Total estimates for 1918		5,700,525.66
Total appropriations in law for 1917		5,355,096.66
Net increase in estimates for 1918		345,530.00

NOTE.—The following items of reappropriation are carried by the draft of bill:

Nineteenth Conference Interparliamentary Union	$40,000.00
International Commission on Public and Private International Law	15,000.00
Fifth International Conference of American States	75,000.00
Total of reappropriations	130,000.00

We carefully considered every item of the accompanying bill, especially those items where increases over the actual appropriations were asked for, and the new items proposed in the estimates, as will be shown by the hearings had before the committee.

We also investigated the expenditures made by the several commissions and boards, under the supervision of the Department of State, as will also be shown by the printed hearings.

The appendix to the letter of estimates, prepared by the Department of State, gives so fully the reasons for asking for increases in certain appropriations, as well as for the new, and other items carried by the accompanying bill, the committee deems it useless to repeat them herein. This document is attached to this report for the information of Members.

We have made every effort to keep the total appropriations carried by the bill within the bounds of reasonable economy, and yet not impair the efficiency of the Diplomatic and Consular Service. This end your committee believes has been attained, notwithstanding the fact that the total appropriations carried by this bill show a very substantial decrease as compared with the total appropriations for the year 1917—to wit, $189,350.

The changes made in the accompanying bill, as compared with the Diplomatic and Consular appropriations for 1917, are shown in detail by the table following:

Items increased over law of 1917:
Waterways, United States and Canada		$6,000.00
Salaries in Consular Service		69,500.00
Post allowances		50,000.00
Salaries of interpreters		5,000.00
Expenses of interpreters		5,000.00
Contingent expenses, United States consulates		28,500.00
		164,000.00
New items in bill for 1918:
For purchase of legation premises at Costa Rica	$40,000.00
For purchase of legation premises at Nicaragua	80,000.00
Contribution to Seaman's Mission at Rio de Janeiro	50.00
		120,050.00
Total increases		284,050.00
Items eliminated from law of 1917:
Salaries, marshals for consular courts	10,000.00
Consular building, Shanghai	355,000.00
Consular building, Habana	100,000.00
		465,000.00
Items decreased for 1918:
Boundary line, United States and Canada	6,000.00
Salaries and expenses United States court, China	2,400.00
		473,400.00
Total of decreases (as above)		473,400.00
Total of increases (as above)		284,050.00
Net decrease in total appropriations carried by law for 1917		189,350.00
Total of appropriations carried by the law for 1917		5,355,096.66
Total of appropriations carried by bill for 1918		5,165,746.66
Net decrease in bill for 1918		189,350.00

We deem it proper to say that the continuance of the almost world-wide war has devolved upon our entire Diplomatic Service a large amount of labor as well as unavoidable expense, to meet which conditions the increases carried by the accompanying bill your committee deem just and adequate.

We have made an additional appropriation for the Consular Service of $69,500 to enable the State Department to increase our consulates in South America and Russia, and have increased the contingent fund appropriated for our consulates by $28,500, which will just cover the expense of the additional consulates.

The committee worked very hard over this bill and feels quite proud of the result of its labors. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the subject of the Consular Service, the gentleman indicates there has been some increase in the bill. Does that increase mean that some of these very poorly paid consuls of ours in foreign countries—that is, consuls and consular agents—are going to get any more money?

Mr. FLOOD. No; it does not mean that. The increase here is for the purpose of increasing the number of consuls, and the increased appropriation here will go to these new consuls.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman why it was not possible by this bill to make provision for increased pay for some of our very poorly paid consuls, in view of the high cost of living that prevails in Europe?

Mr. FLOOD. So far as the high cost of living is concerned, we make an appropriation in this bill of $200,000 to enable the President to add to the allowances of diplomats and their secretaries and to consuls. This fund is carried in the current law to enable the President to adjust salaries and allowances to these officers to meet the high cost of living.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be only in the matter of expenses, would it not? It would not be in the way of emolument or salary?

Mr. FLOOD. It is the same thing. It is an allowance to meet the high cost of living—an increased appropriation for that specific purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that in some countries, particularly in the Far East, the expenses of transportation and hotel expense have increased so enormously that some of our consuls have been obliged to suggest that they would leave the service unless they could be better paid.

Mr. FLOOD. Some of them have left the service, and have gotten much higher remuneration than when in the service. Some of those who have left have been quite a loss to the service, but I think it would be a good thing for the service if some who are still in the service did leave it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know that I will agree with the gentleman as to that, because consuls are men who should have experience, and you can not dress up a new man and make him a consul all at once. Some of them are getting $1,500 in countries where they have to fraternize with foreign potentates, and it is mighty difficult for them to do it on the income they receive.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I cite to the gentleman, on page 23 of the bill, this provision:

> To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $200,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Virginia answered that no extra compensation was provided for.

Mr. FLOOD. I say that no salary was increased. I stated that we had an item in the bill for $200,000 to enable the President, in his discretion, to make allowances to diplomatic and consular officers to adjust their official incomes to the additional high cost of living in most of the countries of the world.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want the gentleman to know that I am not fishing for any political information at all. We are prone to do that.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that any particular consul gets less than $1,500 a year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, some of the vice consuls do.

Mr. FLOOD. Some of the vice consuls do not get anything.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And some of the consular agents also.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And some of them have to keep up their status as American representatives with officials of other nations that are much better paid and who have fixed habitations provided for them by their own governments.

Mr. FLOOD. The Committee on Foreign Affairs deemed it unwise to increase the salaries of any persons in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, except these temporary increases which the President is allowed to make owing to the high cost of living.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take advantage of this opportunity in the gentleman's time to say that it has come to my attention that some cases of severe hardship have resulted from the increase in the cost of living in some of the foreign countries, so far as some of our representatives are concerned. It has been due largely to the question of transportation; the fact that they have been removed from one place to another, and the fact that the transportation rates have been increased and the cost of living has increased, and the fact that their compensation has not been increased commensurate with the charges that they have had to pay. It seems to me that in providing new consulates the committee might have considered the question of providing better pay for some of the able and efficient and experienced consuls we now have representing us abroad.

Mr. FLOOD. The increase of pay was not suggested by the State Department, and if it had been I do not believe it would have been favorably received by the committee. As the gentleman no doubt is aware, for two or three years back and at this time, the cost of living in the belligerent countries and countries adjacent to them has increased greatly, and therefore we put this sum of $200,000 in the hands of the President to enable him to make allowances to diplomatic and consular officers to compensate them for the additional high cost of living in the places they are assigned to at the present time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, taking this paragraph on page 3, the President does seem to have authority to make additional allowances in cases where he sees fit, which would meet certain cases of emergency?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state whether it has been called to the attention of the committee that private corporations, many of them with world-wide influence, have made overtures to many of our consuls abroad, and have induced some of them to leave the Government service?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. That statement was made by a representative of the consular service, and he said that some of our consuls had gone into the service of private corporations, and that probably others would do so in the near future.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mention this because it would seem to indicate that it might be well to raise the compensation of some of our consuls who are now poorly paid and thus prevent their leaving the service.

Mr. FLOOD. Our consuls are pretty well paid. Their compensation ranges from $2,000 to $12,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think the average consul gets $12,000 a year.

Mr. FLOOD. Some of them do.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question concerning the steam launch at Constantinople. How many years have we carried that item?

Mr. FLOOD. About 10 years.

Mr. WINGO. Is there a law for that?

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is speaking of the one at Constantinople?

Mr. WINGO. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOOD. That is for the use of our embassy staff.

Mr. WINGO. There is no authority or law for it, is there?

Mr. FLOOD. It was first carried in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WINGO. This item is used for the renting of a private launch there by the year?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. They live in one part of the city and they have their offices in another part. It is cheaper to rent it than it is to own it. It is necessary to convey the embassy staff from Pera across the channel connecting the business and residence sections of Constantinople.

Mr. WINGO. Cheaper to rent it than to own and maintain it?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. That was the testimony before the committee.

Mr. WINGO. The necessity for the use of that is the necessity of carrying the embassy officials to and from their office?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Is there no other means of transportation available?

Mr. FLOOD. No. That is the only way they can get from the residence to the business section of the city.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. In the last item in the bill, "Acquisition of legation premises at Managua, Nicaragua," I notice that the appropriation carries this language included in the item, "and for the erection on the premises of suitable quarters for the legation guard." Is there a legation guard now at Nicaragua?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Does that mean the marines who are stationed there?

Mr. FLOOD. There is a permanent guard there.

Mr. TOWNER. I say, does not that mean the marines?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Do the marines constitute the legation guard?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. I think there are 114 of them.

Mr. TOWNER. The support of the marines is not included in this bill in any way?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no. That is carried in the naval bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Is there any other place except China where the legation guard is now being maintained?

Mr. FLOOD. I think not.

Mr. TOWNER. Nicaragua and China are the only places?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. What is the object of maintaining this legation guard now in Nicaragua?

Mr. FLOOD. The State Department deemed it to be necessary. The conditions have been unsettled there.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. On page 24, as to expenses of prisons for American convicts, I would like, as a matter of information, to know what that means. I refer to the item beginning line 16, "Expenses of prisons for American convicts." Then reference is made to China and later to Siam and Turkey.

Mr. FLOOD. We have to maintain a prison at Shanghai. We have a court there with extraterritorial jurisdiction, and this is a prison maintained to keep any convicts in.

Mr. EMERSON. The Government of China permits us to do that?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. We have a treaty that permits the court and permits the prison.

Mr. EMERSON. I never heard of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SALARIES OF AMBASSADORS AND MINISTERS.

Ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Spain, and Turkey, at $17,500 each, $227,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill state whether it is the custom of the United States to suggest to a foreign country the raising of an ambassadorship, or whether that suggestion usually comes from the foreign country to the United States?

Mr. FLOOD. I think in the last three cases the intimations have come from the foreign country to the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question has arisen as to whether this country ought to have an ambassador at The Hague. We have a minister there now, or at least had one before he returned to the United States, and I have been asked as to whether the suggestion to raise that relationship from minister to ambassador should come from The Hague or should originate with the United States.

Mr. FLOOD. I think, if The Hague wants it, an intimation—not an official suggestion, but an intimation—that they want it should be made, and if then they should appoint an ambassador to the United States, Congress would be very apt to meet them by passing a law authorizing the President to appoint an ambassador to The Hague; but if the idea originated with us, I think we could make the intimation. I do not think there is any rule as to which country shall take the initiative.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, the law originally was—and is now, unless it has been changed—that we could not designate any envoy as an ambassador unless the country to which our envoy was to be accredited had first designated its representative as an ambassador.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think there is any law on the subject.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; it was carried in one of the bills some years ago, and unless it has been changed that is the law now.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think the law exists now, but in the last three cases—I happened to handle them; Argentina, Chile, and Spain—the intimation came to our Government in some way that those countries wished it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At the time our first ambassadorships were created, it was under a law passed by Congress and carried in an appropriation bill, if I remember rightly, which provided that we might designate our ministers as ambassadors if the other country had taken the initial step.

Mr. FLOOD. More recently, however, we have in each case passed a special law authorizing the President to name an ambassador.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has it occurred at any time during the gentleman's experience that the United States has originated the suggestion?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has always come from the other side, so far as the gentleman knows.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was the law originally.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Roumania, Serbia, and Bulgaria, $10,000.

Mr. BORLAND. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Roumania, Serbia, and Bulgaria is one individual accredited to all three of those countries?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. He is a joint minister to the three Balkan countries?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Where does he have his seat of office?

Mr. FLOOD. In Roumania.

Mr. BORLAND. I suppose the intention is to continue at present that joint representation in spite of the fact that there is a line of division now between those countries?

Mr. FLOOD. The State Department was very anxious to have two ministers, one to Bulgaria and the other to Roumania and Serbia, but international conditions are such that it is not thought wise to undertake to make the change at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES OF SECRETARIES IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

For secretaries in the Diplomatic Service as provided in the act of February 5, 1915, entitled "An act for the improvement of the foreign service," approved February 5, 1915, $186,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BENNET: On page 3, in line 6, after the end of line 6, insert:

"Provided, however, That no secretary who, as chargé d'affaires, at any time during 1916 refused any privilege to any American citizen because such citizen criticized the President of the United States shall be paid any salary from this appropriation."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to a point of order. It is a mere limitation. It simply provides that no secretary who during 1916 refused any privilege to any citizen of the United States because that citizen criticized the President of the United States shall be paid any salary out of this appropriation. The Congress of the United States have a perfect right to limit any appropriation.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. I withdraw the point of order. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I reserve the point of order for a moment. Because I can not read the amendment, which I have now examined, I withdraw my reservation of the point of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. BENNET. I understood the chairman of the committee to say he had no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point in connection with the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. The reason for this amendment is shown in the following correspondence:

To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

SIR: I rejoice to see that Americans have entered their protest in your columns against President Wilson's most strange and grotesque felicitations to the Austrian Emperor.

This abominable person represents the antipodes of everything for which America is supposed to stand. He has not one ideal that is capable of being squared with ours. At a time like this, when the fundamentals of our faith are under desperate attack from him and his allies, it is most deplorable to compromise about an issue that transcends everything else in the world. Courtesy is all very well, but if you really believe what you profess can you be courteous to a power that is aiming its guns straight at the heart of democracy. A country is not certain outlines on a map. It is an idea. If the idea of America and the idea of the Austrian Monarchy are compatible, then the Republic must be something very different from our pretensions about it.

EMBASSY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Paris, August 29, 1916.

CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL, Esq.,
Hotel de France et Choiseul, Paris.

SIR: Since receiving your call this morning, when you requested the good offices of the embassy to facilitate your obtaining privileges from the Belgian Government as accorded to newspaper correspondents, a communication to the Paris edition of the New York Herald over your name has been brought to my attention.

In view of your criticism therein of the President, I do not feel justified in giving you a letter of recommendation to the Belgian legation.

Your letter of credentials from the Newspaper Enterprise Association which you left with me this morning is herewith returned.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBT. W. BLISS,
Chargé d'Affaires.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 7, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BENNET: Allow me to thank you sincerely for your very kind letter of yesterday. I rejoice that you perceive the grave significance of the incident your resolution refers to and are determined to get a ruling upon it. Every American is deeply concerned and should be deeply interested in the issue. The personal aspects of it are nothing whatever, but I desire very much to have an answer to the question I put to Mr. Bliss:

"Is an American citizen that criticizes the President on a different footing with public servants from an American citizen that does not criticize the President?"

I believe that is vital, and I want to know about it.

The newspaper account quoted in your resolution is substantially correct. Some small details are omitted, and there is one slight error. I applied to the embassy, not in a personal capacity but as the representative of 205 daily newspapers of the United States, and this fact Mr. Bliss fully understood, for I delivered to him my credentials and he kept them until he delivered to me his letter refusing to grant me the purely technical indorsement that all other American correspondents received without question. The error, which is wholly immaterial, is that the whole incident took place in the same day. It was at 4 p. m. that I returned by request to get Mr. Bliss's response.

I was accompanied by Mr. David L. Patterson, representing the Pittsburgh Gazette-Times. He got his letter of indorsement at the same time that Mr. Bliss handed me his refusal in my case. Patterson is now teaching history in the University of Kansas. Since my return I have had a letter from him, unsolicited, commending the accuracy of the newspaper reports of the case and offering to testify at any time that they were correct.

It seems to me that if the principle on which Mr. Bliss acted is confirmed and indorsed we are confronted with a novel and most disturbing situation. Mr. Hughes criticized the President in the last campaign. Suppose Mr. Hughes was to go abroad now. Is he to be deprived of the protection and courtesies of American embassies and legations? And if his status is altered in the eyes of American diplomatic representatives abroad can it remain the same in the eyes of other public servants at home? How can a distinction be drawn between his status abroad and his status at home? And if we start to undermine any of his rights anywhere because of his attitude toward the President, where shall we draw the line[

I think you are doing a very great public service in pushing this matter. I wish it had arisen in regard to some other citizen, but in an issue of such moment personal considerations are nothing. If I can give you any information or support please command me in any way.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 15, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BENNET: I inclose a copy of my letter in the Paris edition of the New York Herald that caused the issue to be raised. Several other Americans wrote similar letters that the Herald published. I was always curious to know how the embassy's rule was carried out in their case but never found out. I do not imagine any discrimination could have been made; it was a general principle that Mr. Bliss announced.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL.

Any citizen has the right to criticize the President of the United States or any other official. If a man in the Diplomatic Service does not know this he ought not to be in the Diplomatic Service.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $200,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1917, which is hereby reappropriated and made available for this purpose: Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I make a point or order against the proviso beginning on line 21, page 8. It is clearly a change of existing law.

Mr. Chairman, the legislative, executive, and judicial bill carries a very liberal appropriaton for the clerks and other employees of the State Department in the District of Columbia. I am opposed to provisions in any appropriation bill giving the head of any department the privilege of using a part of a lump-sum appropriation to augment the specific appropriations made for a particular service in the District of Columbia. This matter was considered in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations on the legislative bill, and the chief clerk of the Department of State stated that there had been a number of employments made under this provision which is carried for the current year, but he was unable to tell the committee exactly what employments had been made or the salaries paid and services rendered.

Mr. FLOOD. Between $4,000 and $5,000 was used.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit that it is not good policy to appropriate specifically for the employment of clerks in the District of Columbia and then have a fund here and a fund there placed at the disposal of the heads of the departments to be used to augment their number.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is right, it is not a sound policy under ordinary conditions, but this is a very extraordinary condition and will continue so for a few years to come. The Secretary of State thought it was necessary in case he brought a man from abroad to render services in the department that he should have some fund out of which he could pay him and that it might be necessary to use some extra fund to enforce this.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the question has been passed on by the House. The legislative bill of the current year approved May 10, 1916, has a specific provision preventing this very thing. It is not a new question. It provides that none of the money appropriated by any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the employment or payment of personal services in the Department of State in Washington, D. C.

In other words, Congress passed on this question at the last session and specifically refused to authorize the provision. It is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not question that it is subject to a point of order, but I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, in view of the extraordinary conditions that obtain in the State Department, to withdraw his objections.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman states that under the provision in the current law only four or five thousand dollars have been expended. I submit that if the Secretary of State does not need more than four or five thousand dollars to pay these expenses in the department it is not going to work a very great hardship if this provision goes out. I do not think it is good policy or a good rule of legislation to undertake to make appropriations in lump sum and then provide that an unlimited portion may be used for clerical services in the District of Columbia. Congress ought to know what clerks are employed in the District of Columbia and the amount of the compensation. We ought to be able to provide for them, and we do provide for them specifically.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman's position is that there ought not to be an unlimited sum. Would the gentleman suggest what he thinks would be a reasonable sum for use in the District of Columbia?

Mr. FLOOD. Here is a whole fund that is to be used, and——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not questioning that. I do not think the Secretary of State would use any more of the fund than he thought necessary. I do not care to place any limit upon it if it is going in at all. I am opposed to the principle of permitting lump sums made for the purpose of taking care of governmental functions outside of the District of Columbia to be used for personal services in the District of Columbia, when in another bill appropriation is specifically made for such particular service.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman will admit that the work in the State Department has increased more than in any other department within the last two years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, but I submit that this bill is not the bill to take care of the services required by the State Department in the District of Columbia.

The gentleman is familiar with the fact that the current legislative bill carries an appropriation for 100 clerks, more or less, in addition to those formerly employed in the State Department in order to take care of the emergency.

I submit that if the State Department needs an additional force in the District of Columbia the appropriation ought to be carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which under the rules of the House is authorized to carry the appropriation, and for that reason I insist on the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will withhold his point of order for a moment. I am not going to discuss the point of order. We will concede it if the gentleman insists upon it. If the gentleman will note the wording of this section before the proviso, it is—

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes.

This is an extraordinary case. It is a condition where the President might at any time need the personal services of some one in the District of Columbia to meet unforeseen emergencies attending the execution of our neutrality laws—a most important proposition. The Committee on Foreign Affairs last year was of the same opinion as the gentleman from Tennessee, and they did not desire to put in the proposition until the Secretary of State had talked with the committee explaining its purposes and had written a letter explaining the whole proposition. I want to read a letter written by Mr. Carr, of the Consular Service, touching this appropriation. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 25, 1916.

The Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLOOD: Referring to our conversation of a few days ago, in regard to making the emergency fund available for personal services in the District of Columbia, I submit an amendment in the form of a proviso to be added, on line 3, page 9 of the bill as reported by the committee, which I think will accomplish the purpose which I believe the Secretary has in mind. I am sure the Secretary would greatly appreciate any steps which you may take to have this change made in the bill, either in the House or by the Senate Committee on Appropriations after the bill shall have been passed by the House. Without a provision of this kind the President and the Secretary will be without any means to employ special personal services in the District of Columbia, if at any time such services should be urgently required.

Very sincerely, yours,

WILBUR J. CARR,
Director of the Consular Service.

Now, if the point of order is sustained, as it will be if insisted upon, it might greatly hamper the President and State Department in maintaining our neutrality as well as extending our commercial interests. It is quite different from any other class suggested by the gentleman. It is not the policy of the committee to continue this policy; it is not to be a permanent law, but merely temporary, to meet an emergency that has arisen by virtue of the war.

In all sincerity, I say to the gentleman he may cripple the service of the State Department if he insists upon the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I can not see any connection between this proviso and the enforcement of the neutrality laws. Of course, the gentleman has read into his argument some connection with it, but the proviso is absolutely unlimited. It provides simply that a part or all of this fund of $200,000 may be employed for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law. That is certainly as broad a provision as could be drawn, and I do not see, as I say, any particular connection between that and the enforcement of the neutrality laws.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman will recall that we appropriate quite a large sum of money as a contingent fund for the President to expend in his discretion, and certainly we ought to trust the President of the United States in a matter like this, of maintaining the neutrality laws, especially when we are facing a world condition which the Government has never faced before.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not a question of trusting the President of the United States or the Secretary of State or anyone else, as far as that is concerned. Certainly no one would hesitate to do that. It is true that large lump-sum appropriations are made to be used by the President and the Secretary of State subject alone to their own discretion, and it is highly proper that this should be done, but here is a proposition to employ personal services in the District of Columbia, when, as a matter of fact, the House has already passed a bill making, as I believe, ample provision allowing to the Secretary of State every clerk and every employee estimated for, and I submit that when the House adopts the estimate of the Secretary of State and allows him all of the employees that he asks for his department for the next fiscal year, we ought not to be asked then to give unlimited authority to use a fund of $200,000 in the employment of services here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. What is the difference, if any, in the amount asked for by the various departments and the actual revenues of the Government?

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as the State Department is concerned and the Foreign Affairs Committee, we have appropriated about $200,000 less in this bill than was asked for.

Mr. CARLIN. I am making the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] whether it is not a fact that the departments have asked for about $300,000,000 more than the estimated revenues of the Government?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; they are in the red.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think they have asked for a great deal more than the estimated revenues. I do not know exactly how much it is. The gentleman is possibly correct in his figures.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That criticism ought not to be leveled against the Foreign Affairs Committee. If there has been one committee in this House that has practiced economy in bringing in its bill, it has been this committee.

Mr. CARLIN. I think that is true.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. We have reduced the appropriations in this bill, notwithstanding the world conditions, $189,000.

Mr. CARLIN. I mention this fact because I have recently seen it reported that the Congress was being criticised for its extravagance in appropriations, and I want it to appear that if there is any extravagance, the extravagance is in the departments themselves, who have asked for about $300,000,000 more than the estimated revenues of the Government. As far as this item is concerned, it seems to me that it is a question of jurisdiction as between committees. The Committee on Appropriations does not think that the gentleman's committee ought to provide for this, and yet the Committee on Appropriations had no hesitation in undertaking to take away from the Committee on Military Affairs the jurisdiction over its appropriations.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, the Committee on Appropriations was not making any effort to take anything from the military committee.

Mr. CARLIN. That was the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Appropriation Committee or a portion of it felt that the office of the Chief of Staff and the employees of the Chief of Staff were people who were employed here constantly in the District of Columbia and, therefore, clearly under the rules of the House, that appropriation belongs to the legislative bill. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole differed from the committee, and it went out on a point of order. There is no quarrel about that.

Mr. CARLIN. Is it not a fact that this is the second time your committee has had a ruling from the Chair on that subject, and did you not appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No, indeed; this is the first time the Committee on Appropriations ever carried an appropriation for the office of Chief of Staff in its bill, and it only carries it this time because in the last bill the office of the Chief of Staff was separated from the clerks who were carried upon the field roll, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made the statement—and I feel sure that his memory is correct—that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session stated that his bill would not undertake to carry this appropriation.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, we all know that the Appropriations Committee never tires of taking all the jurisdiction it can get——

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, I have the floor. The point I was trying to make is this, that this House is not subject to the criticism that we are receiving in the press.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Virginia is unquestionably right about that.

Mr. CARLIN. When the fact is that the departments are extravagant, and are asking for $300,000,000 more than the entire revenues of the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. The departments have estimated for a great deal more than any committee has been willing to give them.

Mr. CARLIN. Haven't they asked for more than the entire revenues of the Government?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably, that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has called for the regular order. Does the gentleman from Tennessee insist upon the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the remark of my friend from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD, I wish to say that in this particular instance, at least, the Committee on Appropriations is not trying to take something that does not belong to it, but is trying to prevent the Committee on Foreign Affairs from assuming a jurisdiction that belongs to the Committee on Appropriations. I make the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I did not say that the Appropriations Committee tried to take something that did not belong to it in this case, but I said that we all know that it does reach out and try to grab the jurisdiction of every other committee in the House, if it gets a chance. This is a case where in order to enable the President and Secretary of State to properly enforce the neutrality laws it was thought that the secret emergency fund at the disposal of the President might be used to pay some officials in Washington who were engaged in enforcing those neutrality laws. It is subject to a point of order; we do not deny it. We thought it was wise it should go in this bill and that such discretion should be given to the President to use part of this fund for this purpose. But if the gentleman insists upon the point of order we will not undertake to argue against it.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question if I can get his ear, and that is this: If in an item of this importance, where the discretion for the expenditure is lodged in the President himself, the gentleman does not think that the rule we should adopt here of personal conduct with reference to these items should be one as to whether the item is necessary and not one as to what committee should make the appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennesee. I do. I am not making the point of order wholly upon the ground that this Committee on Foreign Affairs is attempting to intrench upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. I make it upon this ground, that the Committee on Appropriations allowed to the Department of State every single clerk and employee for which the Secretary of State asked for services here in the District of Columbia, and, having allowed his estimates as he submitted them, it seems to me we ought not to permit a provision to go into this bill permitting an unlimited expenditure of the entire $200,000, if thought proper, for similar services here in the District.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to interrupt the gentleman at this point——

Mr. FLOOD. I would like——

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman can not until I have finished. I had the floor, and I think I am reaching the very point.

Mr. FLOOD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to discuss the point of order just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made.

Mr. CARLIN. But the point of order is subject to discussion. The fact that the chairman concedes the point of order and the gentleman from Mississippi concedes the point of order, it does not necessarily follow that everybody else concedes the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. In that connection, I want to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee with reference to this point of order, if it is not true in his opinion that this emergency fund ought to be allowed the department? If the gentleman thinks it ought not to be allowed the department, he ought to insist upon this point of order; but if he thinks the department ought to have the discretion, then, it seems to me, the gentleman ought not to insist upon his point of order. Here is an emergency occasion existing such as we have never experienced before. The fund is in proper hands. The President of the United States can be trusted to exercise properly his discretion, and unless the gentleman feels that it is not going to be exercised properly it seems to me he ought not to insist upon his point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have no question as to any improper exercise of authority that might be conferred upon the Secretary of State or any other distinguished officer of this Government. I do repeat that the House already having made provision for the services in the Department of State here in the District of Columbia, and having allowed to the Secretary of State——

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). We ought not to be asked now to appropriate an unlimited——

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman the Secretary of State made an estimate which went before the Committee on Appropriations in the legislative bill with this law existing. This provision was in the law last year. He knew he could use this fund, and he made his estimates upon that basis that he could use this fund, and so the gentleman is not appropriating everything that was needed in reference to the neutrality laws.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We are not responsible for the fact that the Secretary of State went to both committees for an appropriation for services here in the District of Columbia. The fact is the rules of the House provide that one particular appropriation bill shall carry the appropriation for personal services here, and for that reason I am insisting on the point of order.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FLOOD. The fact that Congress passed this very law——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I had the floor to discuss the point of order when these gentlemen interrupted.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized as a member of the committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia had the floor, but the regular order has been called for.

Mr. CARLIN. I was about to discuss the point of order, which I have a right to do.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman makes the point of order, and the Chair sustains it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer. At the end of line 20, page 8, after the word "purpose," insert the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 8, by inserting after the word "purpose," in line 20, the following: "Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ any such part of this fund to an amount of not more than $5,000 for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere notwithstanding the provision of any existing law."

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I would like to state that its purpose is——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi (continuing). That this amendment answers the criticism which the gentleman from Tennessee just made, that you are giving discretion to the President to expend the sum of $200,000.

This limits the amount he can use in the District to $5,000. I cited the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the committee to the letter here which was written by Mr. Carr in behalf of the Secretary of State, showing that at this time there were great complications coming up, due to conditions throughout the world, that this country above all nations was called upon to exercise a high degree of patience and consideration in maintaining our neutrality, and that at times, in order to maintain our neutrality, it was necessary to employ the services of men who might be in the District of Columbia or persons to do some work to carry on that particular service; that there might be men found in the District who are peculiarly qualified by some especial fitness to do the work; men that they could not find outside of the District; and they wanted to exercise that right if the urgency and emergency should arise. And I feel sure that the amendment ought to be adopted. It is cured of that criticism which the gentleman from Tennessee has just made.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] unintentionally, I am sure, puts words into my mouth which I did not use. I want to assure the gentleman from Mississippi for the third time that I have absolute confidence in the President and in the Secretary, and it is not upon the ground that I fear that this fund may be improperly used that I make an objection. It is the principle to which I object, Mr. Chairman, and I thought I had made that clear to every Member here present, even to my good friend from Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will now understand that it is the principle to which I object, the principle of making a direct appropriation in one bill carrying a list of all the clerks and employees who were specifically estimated for, and then in another bill, Mr. Chairman, undertaking to devote a portion, whether great or small, of a lump sum for similar services.

Mr. CARLIN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Had not debate begun on this amendment before any point of order was made?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I reserved the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Had not debate begun before any reservation was made?

Mr. BORLAND. No debate had been begun.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That was the point that was raised, and that was why I started to discuss the proposition.

Mr. BORLAND. I rose to my feet to make the point of order, and the gentleman proceeded with the discussion.

Mr. CARLIN. My question is, Had not debate been begun before there was a reservation of this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Does the Chair think that point of order was made or reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I am in error, then.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on this proposition. Unless the gentleman desires to discuss——

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask the gentleman if he wants to discuss this matter now before the committee or some other matter that he can discuss elsewhere?

Mr. BENNET. I want to discuss this particular amendment, with the hope of inducing the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment I may yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, this is not, as it may seem, a struggle between the committees over the subject of jurisdiction. However desirable it might be to have an emergency fund carried in some other bill, the rules of the House have thought wise to place in one bill, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, all the provisions for the pay of these clerical forces in Washington. If any provision was needed, it should have been carried on that bill. My idea is that the legislative bill does carry such a contingent fund. When it is stated that the Department of State has been operating under the belief that they were entitled to an emergency fund in the diplomatic and consular bill, it will be found on examination that they are not entitled to any such belief, from the fact that Congress and the current law regulating the Department of State for the year 1917 has expressly taken away from the Department of State all foundation for any such claim.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is mistaken about that. This proviso that was ruled out just now reads this way:

That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but the gentleman stated, as I understood it, that that was the current law. They were relying on some sort of emergency fund in the current law, and it ought to be continued for the year 1918.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the current law absolutely forbids it.

Mr. FLOOD. It forbids it if this is in the law.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me read to the gentleman what the current law is. This is from the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the year 1917, approved May 10, 1916. It reads:

No money appropriated by any other act—

Including the Diplomatic bill—shall be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the employment and payment of personal services in the Department of State at Washington, in the District of Columbia.

So that if they ever had any such reliance, Congress expressly legislated on that on the 10th of May, and took it away, and said no money appropriated by any other act should be so used.

Mr. FLOOD. Congress expressly legislated in June, 1916, to the effect that the department did have that power, notwithstanding this law the gentleman refers to as having been enacted in May. One law of Congress is as good as another. This law by implication repeals that law, so far as the Department of State is concerned.

Mr. BORLAND. This illustrates the confusion that results by putting these appropriations in two or more bills.

There is another thing. Every department of the Government feels that it has an emergency of this kind. Not long ago the War Department had placed in the river and harbor bill a provision for the employment of extra service, and for an allowance of extra printing. Without any attention being paid to the matter, it was enacted in one bill, and then when Congress finally found out where the conflict was, it was stricken out in the future bill. Every department of Government may feel that it has this kind of an emergency. The State Department feels it to-day, the War Department to-morrow, and the Department of the Interior may feel it next day.

Now, they will all ask for it in particular appropriation bills outside of the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. There is only one way for Congress to keep track of how much personal service is employed in the District of Columbia, and that is to have it in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. When a Member reads that bill he has the right to assume that it comprises all the personal services rendered in the District of Columbia. So, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point?

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, the gentleman can move to strike out the last word on the next paragraph. The chairman of the committee wants to get along with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking an inquiry of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chairman under what paragraph of this bill the salary of the counselor of the embassy at Paris, France, is carried?

Mr. FLOOD. The salary of the ambassador?

Mr. BENNET. No; the counselor.

Mr. FLOOD. We have no counselor there. We have a provision in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act of the current year authorizing the President to designate the first secretaries of embassies and legations as counselors, and under that authorization has designated at eight of the embassies the first secretaries as counselors, and they draw their salaries from this provision making appropriations for the secretaries.

Mr. BENNET. So the gentleman who has the title of "counselor" at Paris would draw his salary from this provision for secretaries?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; $3,000 a year.

Mr. BENNET. Whatever it is, under the provision on page 3, lines 1 to 6?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; that is it.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary and make the surveys incidental thereto between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, draftsmen, and clerks as are necessary; and for the more effective demarcation and mapping, pursuant to the treaty of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain, of the land and water boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as established under existing treaties, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, including the salaries of the commissioner and the necessary engineers, surveyors, draftsmen, computers, and clerks in the field and at the seat of government, rental of offices at Washington, District of Columbia, expense of printing and necessary traveling, for payment for timber necessarily cut in determining the boundary line not to exceed $1,000, and commutation to members of the field force while on field duty or actual expenses not exceeding $2.50 per day each, to be expended in accordance with regulations from time to time prescribed by the Secretary of State, $105,000, together with the unexpended balances of previous appropriations for these objects: Provided, That hereafter advances of money under the appropriation "Boundary line, Alaska and Canada, and the United States and Canada," may be made to the commissioner on the part of the United States and by his authority to chiefs of parties, who shall give bond under such rules and regulations and in such sum as the Secretary of State may direct, and accounts arising under advances shall be rendered through and by the commissioner on the part of the United States to the Treasury Department as under advances heretofore made to chiefs of parties.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proviso, which is clearly permanent legislation. But I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee what the purpose of that change is?

Mr. FLOOD. What change is it?

Mr. BORLAND. The proviso on line 17, page 11, "That hereafter advances of money on appropriations," and so forth.

Mr. FLOOD. That was put in the last year's bill.

Mr. MANN. It is existing law, is it not?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; it was in the last year's bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Why is it repeated, then?

Mr. MANN. Because they did not realize it is the existing law.

Mr. FLOOD. It was a mistake.

Mr. BORLAND. The word "hereafter" was used last year?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. This is a copy of what was in last year's bill.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not needed, then?

Mr. FLOOD. No; it is not needed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES AND EXPENSES, UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

Judge, $8,000; district attorney, $4,000; marshal, $3,000; clerk, $3,000; stenographer, $1,800; court expenses, including reference law books, $9,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BENNET. I do that for the purpose of asking why the change is made in the appropriation act for the salaries and expenses of the United States court for China?

Mr. FLOOD. What page does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BENNET. On the first page of the gentleman's report it says:

Item decreased for 1918: * * * Salaries and expenses, United States court for China, $2,400.

Mr. FLOOD. Last year Congress made an appropriation of $355,000 to buy buildings for the consulate and the court at Shanghai, and I will say it was purchased for about $65,000 or $70,000 less than the appropriation.

Mr. BENNET. For rent of premises?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; there are no rents now.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NINETEENTH CONFERENCE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION.

The appropriation of $40,000 "For the purpose of defraying the expenses in Washington City incident to the Nineteenth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union to be held in Washington in 1915, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe," made in the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and extended and made available for the calendar years 1916 and 1917 by the diplomatic and consular act approved July 1, 1916, is hereby extended and made available for the calendar year 1918: Provided, That said sum may, in the discretion of the Secretary of State, be expended within the United States, but not elsewhere.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word simply for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is there any provision in the previous law for rendering an itemized account of these expenditures to Congress? There is none here, as I observe.

Mr. FLOOD. Such a provision is usually carried in each item.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This is in pursuance of a previous appropriation evidently. Now, if the previous appropriation provides that there shall be an itemized account rendered, it is perfectly proper. If not, there ought to be an amendment here.

Mr. FLOOD. I think an amendment ought to be offered, because I do not think it was in the previous appropriation bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend as follows: On page 31, line 6, strike out the period at the end of the word "elsewhere," insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided further, That an itemized account of all such expenditures shall be reported to Congress."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Is it not the same amendment that is placed in lines 15 and 16?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. It is the same amendment, except the word "further."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 6, after the word "elsewhere," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following:
"Provided further, That an itemized account of all such expenditures shall be reported to Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIFTEENTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS AGAINST ALCOHOLISM.

To complete the arrangements and provide for the entertainment of the Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism to be held in the United States, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, together with the unexpended balance of previous appropriations for the holding of said congress in the United States: Provided, That an itemized account of all expenditures shall be reported to Congress.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the aggregate amount of the unexpended balance at this time? The gentleman is familiar with that.

Mr. FLOOD. My understanding is, Mr. Chairman, that it is about $45,000.

Mr. SMITH of New York. That would make about $5,000 that has already been expended. I notice that this item does not contain a provision such as we find elsewhere, that "no part of this money should be expended outside of the city of Washington." It is not here.

Mr. FLOOD. That was in both items, and it was stricken out of them.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Would there be any objection to inserting a provision of that kind?

Mr. FLOOD. The committee put that provision in the item providing for the Nineteenth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union and also this item, but the gentlemen in charge of both of these conferences objected to it, and the committee struck it out.

Mr. SMITH of New York. The intention evidently is to prevent junketing trips for these delegates.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not see any necessity of discriminating against this conference. We have stricken it out with respect to the other conferences, and I do not see any reason why we should discriminate against this one. If these gentlemen prefer to meet at Atlantic City, I do not see why we should compel them to come to Washington. They should be allowed to go anywhere they please in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation of $15,000 for the payment of compensation to and the necessary expenses of the representative or representatives of the United States on the International Commission of Jurists, organized under the convention signed at the Third International American Conference August 23, 1906, approved by the Senate February 3, 1908, and ratified by the President February 8, 1908, for the purpose of preparing drafts of codes of public and private international law; and for the payment of the quota of the United States of the expenses incident to the preparation of such drafts, including the compensation of experts under article 4 of the convention, made in the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and extended and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, by the Diplomatic and Consular act approved March 4, 1915, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, by the Diplomatic and Consular act approved July 1, 1916, is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the war in Europe has now lasted nearly two and one-half years, which is long enough. I wish simply to express my commendation of the President of the United States for the circular note which he recently sent to the various powers engaged in war. [Applause.] I do not know whether it will accomplish the purpose, or do any good abroad; but I think it was eminently proper that the President of our country, after this long time that these countries have been engaged in war, should call to the attention of the people of the world the desirability of closing the war; and without regard to partisanship I believe that the whole people of this country will warmly congratulate and commend the President for any effort which he has made or may make toward procuring peace in the world again. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

For salaries of consuls general, consuls, and vice consuls, as provided in the act approved February 5, 1915, entitled "An act for the improvement of the foreign service," $1,208,500. No portion of this sum shall be paid as compensation to vice consuls who are not American citizens: Provided, That if in any case the Secretary of State deems it impracticable immediately to secure a competent vice consul who is an American citizen, he may appoint or retain as vice consul and compensate from this fund a person not an American citizen until such time as he is able to designate a competent American citizen for such post. Every consul general, consul, and, wherever practicable, every consular agent shall be an American citizen.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs whether the International Congress on Social Insurance authorized by the Congress in the third session of the Sixty-first Congress was ever held; and if so, when and where; and if not, what has become of that appropriation?

Mr. FLOOD. My information is that the conference was never held. The appropriation lapsed into the Treasury, and there is no reappropriation of it.

Mr. BENNET. And the project of holding an international conference on social insurance has been for the time being abandoned?

Mr. FLOOD. It would seem so; yes.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman will recall that he and I were conferees on that item in that session.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF PRISONS FOR AMERICAN CONVICTS.

Actual expense of renting a prison at Shanghai for American convicts in China, $1,200; for contingent expenses, $1,800; for the wages of a keeper of such prison, $1,200; and for the wages of an assistant keeper of such prison, $800; $5,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs why the usual appropriation for marshals for these courts in China and Turkey has been omitted this year?

Mr. FLOOD. It was thought by the State Department that there was very little for the marshals to do, and that what work they had to do could be done by the interpreters. There was an appropriation of $10,000 for marshals, and the marshals were dispensed with, and the $10,000 was divided between these two items, each item being increased $5,000.

Mr. BENNET. Where was the $10,000 transferred?

Mr. FLOOD. Five thousand dollars of it was added to the item for salaries of interpreters to consulates in China, Chosen, Japan, and Siberia, and $5,000 to the expenses of interpreters, guards, and so forth in Turkish dominions, Persia, Morocco, northern Africa, and Zanzibar.

Mr. BENNET. I think that is a very wise change.

The Clerk read as follows:

Paying for the keeping and feeding of prisoners in China, Chosen, Siam, and Turkey, and of those convicted by the United States Court for China, $9,000: Provided, That no more than 50 cents per day for the keeping and feeding of each prisoner while actually confined shall be allowed or paid for any such keeping and feeding. This is not to be understood as covering cost of medical attendance and medicines when required by such prisoners.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs how long an item has been carried in this bill for two jails in Turkey? When I was on the committee we had, as I recall it, a prison at Smyrna for American convicts, but apparently we now have a prison in Smyrna and one in Constantinople.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not remember when the first appropriation was made, but it was some years ago. I thought I had a statement of it here, but I have not. I think probably the bill of 1907 was the first one in which it was carried.

Mr. BENNET. I was in Constantinople in 1907, and they had no prison there then. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman how many convicts were kept in either of these prisons, or both of them, last year?

Mr. FLOOD. I could not answer that. Perhaps I ought to have that information, but I have not.

Mr. BENNET. Is it not a fact that they have not had any convicts in either of those prisons for the last 10 years?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think that is a fact.

Mr. BENNET. I remember when I was in Smyrna in 1907 they had not had anybody in that prison for some years before that. I think it would be in line with what the gentleman's committee did about the other item, for marshals, to leave these items out and add these amounts to the appropriation for officials at these two places. I think they are needed more than the jails.

Mr. FLOOD. We will take that into consideration when we make up the next bill.

Mr. BENNET. All right. I do not want to strike them out now.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of grounds and buildings at San Jose, Costa Rica, and for such alteration, repair, and additional furnishing of the same as may be necessary for the use of the legation to Costa Rica, both as a residence of the minister and for the office of the legation, $40,000.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word merely for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee if any provision has been made in this bill or previous bills for the repair of the legation buildings at Bangkok, Siam?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. HICKS. The purpose I have in making the inquiry is this: About three years ago I was in Bangkok, Siam, and visited the American Legation there. The building in which it was housed was in a most pitiful condition. It seems that some 20 years ago the Siamese Government gave to this Government a splendid site on the Menam River, adjoining the English Legation, and also presented us with a building that was standing upon the ground. Yet from that day to this, as I understand it, not one dollar has been expended in keeping that building in a proper state of repair. The result was that when I visited that building there was only one room fit for occupation, and the entire building was in such a state of decay that the American minister was forced to rent quarters in another part of the city, while the building, on one of the most desirable sites in Bangkok, was absolutely neglected, owing to the parsimonious policy of this Government. I think it is a mistake to be so economical, and the failure to provide adequate quarters for our representatives tends to weaken the influence of our diplomatic agents in foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. It is not on account of the policy of Congress. We appropriate $500,000 or $600,000 every year that can be utilized for the repair of such buildings. It is in the discretion of the State Department. I do not think it has ever been entirely used in any year. I think the gentleman ought to make his contribution of experience to the State Department.

Mr. FLOOD. The Congress has made a number of appropriations for the purpose of buying and building embassies. The one the gentleman speaks of has never been brought to the attention of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, nor have we seen any recommendation by the Department of State with reference to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEAMEN'S MISSION AT RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL.

Annual contribution toward the support of the seamen's mission at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, $50.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee how long this item with reference to the Seamen's Mission has been in the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. It is a new item; this is the first time it was ever in the bill.

Mr. BENNET. The language refers to an annual contribution.

Mr. FLOOD. It is expected to be annual hereafter, but this is the first contribution.

Mr. BENNET. What is the particular reason for it at this time?

Mr. FLOOD. I think there is an organization of philanthropic people who have organized a kind of boarding house or hotel for the purpose of protecting the seamen from robbery and exactions by the boarding houses at Rio de Janeiro. They want to interest this Government and also the Brazilian Government in it.

Mr. BENNET. This contribution to a humble mind would seem to be too small to be of any particular benefit.

Mr. FLOOD. It may be that the purpose was to get recognition from the two Governments for this institution, so that the seamen when in this city would be directed to this particular place; but, on the other hand, it may have a better purpose, and we took chances on it.

Mr. BENNET. It is possible that whoever runs the boarding house gets the right to say to those who patronize it or from whom she solicits subscriptions that she has the patronage of Brazil and the American Government and that thereby she will make the enterprise a success.

Mr. FLOOD. It is possible that the recognition will be abused, but in the opinion of those we had before the committee it will not be.

Mr. BENNET. Does the Secretary of State recommend it?

Mr. FLOOD. He does.

Mr. BENNET. As the gentleman knows, the hearings before his committee have not been printed.

Mr. FLOOD. No. The gentleman saw what was in the estimates in regard to this matter.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; and in the report; but that was not conclusive.

Mr. FLOOD. No. I say it is possible that we may be wrong in connection with it, but we had laid before us the statement, and we believed from this statement that this appropriation would be helpful to the American seamen in that port.

Mr. BENNET. Well, it is Christmas; let it go through.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19300, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, has been called away on account of sickness. As acting chairman, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture, I report for him the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Rept. 1248).

The bill was read a first and second time and, with accompanying papers, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order on the bill.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11250, known as the vocational education bill; and pending that motion I will ask unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee on Education from further consideration of Senate bill 703, a similar bill; that the Senate bill be considered in lieu of the House bill; that it shall be in order to strike out all of the text of the Senate bill and insert in lieu thereof the text of the House bill; and that the discussion proceed under the five-minute rule upon the Senate bill thus amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the vocational education bill, and pending that motion he asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Education be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill on the same subject and that the Senate bill be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that is not all of the request. As I understand the gentleman from Georgia, he asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill be dispensed with and that it shall be in order at once, when we reach the five-minute rule, to offer the text of the House bill as an amendment to the Senate bill, strike out all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill, and that the amendment thus offered shall be considered as the original bill, so far as amendment and debate are concerned.

Mr. HUGHES. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. Before we go into Committee of the Whole, can not we make some agreement on time for debate?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think we can do any more than get through with general debate to-day?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Then I do not see any object in agreeing now to close debate.

The motion of Mr. HUGHES was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PAGE of North Carolina in the chair.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, just before this House adjourned at the last session, the House was kind enough to extend to me all of the time that I requested as chairman of the committee to present this bill to the House. Therefore I shall not occupy further time of the committee, but I do wish to say this, that the Committee on Education has had this bill under consideration for many, many months. They have given it their most careful thought, and after doing so they reported that bill out unanimously. Mr. Chairman, the Senate has passed a vocational education bill, and there are only a few controverted points between the Senate and the House, and with this statement I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the remainder of his time, and the gentleman from Iowa is recognized for one hour.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly know what time of the committee to take in the discussion of this bill (S. 703). I presume it must be familiar generally to members of the committee. Fortunately we have had the particular terms of the bill ably and admirably presented to the House by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How much will this bill carry, or how much will it require, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. TOWNER. The amount, I will state to the gentleman from Ohio, is cumulative. The amount that will be appropriated the first year, if all of the States accept the provisions of the act, would be $1,700,000. The total amount that would be appropriated at the end of the cumulative period would amount to $7,200,000. The gentleman understands that these amounts are increased from year to year.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Who is to have the disposition of this money?

Mr. TOWNER. The commission will have the general disposition of it and the States will have the immediate control of it. It is not expected that the commission will control the money that is appropriated in its immediate application, but having established standards, and the board under the terms of the bill may establish standards, it turns the fund over for its practical and immediate application to the State authorities.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question upon that point?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. As I understand the bill every State, before it can get the benefits of the bill, must, by some legislative act, provide for expending a similar amount by the State?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. What I want to ask, thinking of my own State, naturally, is this: This bill may not become a law until our legislature this winter has adjourned, and it would not meet again for two years. Would there be any probability of the State losing its share of this fund during those two years when there is no legislature in session?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not. Of course affirmative action must be taken by the States. But the right to the fund is not lost. Still it might be considered best to call a special session.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The good-roads bill had a similar provision, that the law must be accepted by the State legislature, but it contained a provision that pending the meeting of the State legislature the acceptance of the governor would be valid until the last day of the next succeeding session of the legislature. If that provision is not in this law, and I am not sure whether it is or not, it ought to be put in.

Mr. TOWNER. There is no provision of that kind, but I know of no particular reason why it might not be included.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. That is what I had in mind. I thought there ought to be some provision in the law to provide for cases of that kind.

Mr. TOWNER. I know of no reason why an amendment may not be presented to cover the point made by the gentleman from Missouri.

It may be of some interest to members of the committee if something be said as to the origin and development of this legislation.

HISTORIC SKETCH.

In 1859, Senator Morrill, of Vermont, introduced and secured the passage through Congress of the first bill creating State agricultural and mechanical colleges.

This bill was vetoed by President Buchanan, because he feared it would "cause the States to lean upon the National Government for the support of their own educational systems," and because he considered it unconstitutional.

It was reintroduced by Senator Morrill, again passed Congress, and was signed by Abraham Lincoln. It became a law in 1862.

This law gave to each State 30,000 acres of public land for each Senator and Representative in Congress for the support of at least one college in each State, the leading object of which would be to teach agriculture and the mechanic arts. This was the first aid granted by the Nation for vocational education.

In 1887 Congress passed the Hatch Act, under the terms of which a State agricultural experiment station was established in each State, and $15,000 was appropriated from the National Treasury annually for its support.

In 1890 an act was passed by Congress known as the second Morrill Act, granting to the colleges created by the first Morrill Act $25,000 annually in their support.

In 1906 what is known as the Adams Act was passed, by which an additional sum of $15,000 annually was given each State for conducting original research and experiment work in "agricultural industry."

In 1907 another act of Congress was passed, known as the Nelson amendment, which gave $25,000 each year in the further support of the Morrill agricultural colleges, a portion of which was to be expended in preparing instructors for teaching agriculture and the mechanic arts.

In 1907 Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota introduced a bill to make an annual appropriation for industrial education in both agricultural and city schools and for branch experiment stations.

In 1910 Senator Dolliver introduced a bill of similar character on which extended hearings were had. The bill was favorably reported, and it is thought would have become a law but for Senator Dolliver's untimely death.

In 1912 Senator PAGE, of Vermont, introduced what is known as the Page bill. It embodied the main features of the Dolliver bill, but was much wider in its scope and more elaborate in its provisions.

About the same time Senator SMITH of Georgia and Representative LEVER of South Carolina introduced a bill to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with the Morrill agricultural colleges. This bill became a law and is now known as the Smith-Lever Act.

Owing to a friendly controversy which arose between the friends of vocational education as to the scope and terms of the contemplated legislation a joint resolution was passed by Congress providing for a commission which should consider the need and report a plan for national aid to vocational education. The commission consisted of Senators HOKE SMITH and C. S. PAGE, Representatives DUDLEY M. HUGHES and S. D. FESS, and John A. Lapp, Florence M. Marshall, Agnes Nestor, C. A. Prosser, and Charles H. Winslow. Their report was filed June 1, 1914. As might have been expected from a body composed of such able men and women, the report is able, exhaustive, and has been of great value in subsequent consideration of the proposition.

Senator SMITH introduced in the Senate and Representative HUGHES in the House bills embodying in substance the recommendations of the commission. The Smith bill passed the Senate without material alteration. The Hughes bill was reported to the House with some changes, the principal one being the constitution of the board.

In the original bill the Federal board was composed of the Postmaster General, Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of Commerce, and Secretary of Labor. In the amended Hughes bill the board is to consist of the Commissioner of Education and four associate members to be appointed by the President.

NATIONAL CONTROL.

It is not the purpose of this bill to supersede or supervise the great work of educating the people now so successfully carried on by the States.

The need of special work has become manifest. This work will require large additional outlays. It is entirely proper that the General Government shall stimulate and assist in this work. The entire work of supervision, teaching, and administration is left with the States. The only limitations placed upon the States are those which are intended to insure the application of the funds for the purposes intended.

It has been strongly urged that appropriations from the National Treasury for educational purposes are not authorized by the Constitution. That was one of the grounds upon which President Buchanan based his veto of the first Morrill bill. But Abraham Lincoln was at least as good a lawyer and as great a statesman as James Buchanan, and he approved the Morrill bill. It should be remembered that James Buchanan also vetoed the homestead bill, which Abraham Lincoln afterwards signed. Buchanan also considered the homestead act unconstitutional.

Altogether, the National Government has granted for schools and colleges nearly 150,000,000 acres of land from the public domain.

Nor have its grants been limited to land alone. Since 1887 direct appropriations of money from the Treasury have been made in many instances. It is too late now to question the constitutional right of the Government to aid the States in any project of education, broad enough in scope to be considered national, and making for the general welfare of the whole people of the Union.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I am very strongly in favor of this legislation, and I have no doubt of its constitutionality; but I want to ask the gentleman whether there is not a distinction between making grants of land or even appropriations of money to the States for educational purposes and establishing a supervisory board which shall have executive duties in regard to such education? Is there not quite a distinction between those things, and are we not in this bill, as we were in the good-roads bill, really assuming activities that we formerly thought were not within the scope of the Federal power?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the strength of the suggestion, but I think that it can hardly be said that the bill establishes a supervisory board with executive duties. The bill itself establishes standards, or rather requisites, compliance with which entitles the States to their quota; and the board has little to do beyond determining whether the States have complied with the requirements of the bill. I think the gentleman will agree with me that where conditions are imposed by the terms of an act it is entirely proper to leave to some executive department or to some board or commission which Congress may create the duty of determining whether or not those conditions have been met, and that is all this bill does.

Mr. BORLAND. I heartily agree with the gentleman. I think it is unwise for the Federal Government to grant either appropriations of money or land donations unless it reserves to itself the right of supervision and control over the expenditure of that fund; and yet it does seem to me that it is a departure from the real old-fashioned ideas of State rights, which jealously exclude the Federal Government from any of these activities.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, I hardly think, I will say to the gentleman, that this bill goes too far. The gentleman will observe that by the terms of the bill the immediate application of the fund is left with the States. This is not only wise for constitutional reasons, but also because the needs of the States and localities are so varied that it would be impossible to frame general provisions that would be adapted to the needs of the whole country and each particular locality. The State boards, however, are acquainted with local conditions and can wisely and intelligently make application of the funds.

THE COST.

It is admitted that vocational teaching is expensive. The requisite apparatus and material make it so. But on the other hand, there is no other form of education that makes so immediate and so large financial returns. The demand is constant and insistent for skilled labor. The educated mechanic and artisan are in greater demand and command higher wages than ever before. We are the most intelligent of peoples, and have more initiative and adaptation. And yet we are behind other nations in efficiency. Under normal conditions 65 per cent of our exports are unmanufactured, crude products. Every bushel of grain, every bale of cotton, every bar of iron or copper that we send in that form across the seas to be there formed for service by more skilled hands is a confession of our own ignorance, incompetence, and inefficiency.

Appropriations for the industrial education of our people can not be called extravagance or wastefulness. It is not a gratuity, it is an investment. It is not a charity, it is an advancement. As an investment, it will pay better returns than any other that can be proposed. As an advancement, it will bring us not only interest, but the accumulated profits of a larger prosperity and a better citizenship.

AGRICULTURAL TRAINING.

The improvement and development of rural life in the United States is of immense importance. If it shall not keep pace with the progress of the times and the growth and development of the Nation in other regards, the results will be not merely unfortunate but calamitous. We have as a heritage the greatest national resources for agricultural production and development of any nation in the world, greater even than all the nations of Europe combined.

Farm life in the United States offers the surest, healthiest, happiest means of livelihood. But neither happiness nor success can be obtained on farm, plantation, or ranch without knowledge. The drudgery of farm life which has been so marked a feature in the past, and which still discredits it in the general esteem, will slowly disappear in the light of wider knowledge and better methods.

Science has touched farm life as with a magic wand, and it has blossomed beneath its potent touch. In the sunny Southland where one-third of a bale of cotton has with difficulty been obtained from an acre of land, it has been demonstrated that three bales can be added to the Nation's wealth. On the broad prairies of the West, where 15 bushels of corn per acre by hard and arduous toil were in the years gone by secured, 75 bushels are now being added to the food products of the world. In the farther West, where on the sandy barrens nothing but burrs and cactus were found, millions of acres of wheat are now yearly yielding their golden store. A machine does the work of a dozen men. Swine and cattle and horses have doubled in average size. Farm appliances have multiplied and cunning inventions lessened toil.

This and more science has done and can do for agriculture. Still these are individual instances. Unfortunately, general conditions are not so good. Our average yield of wheat per acre is 15 bushels. That of Germany is 32 bushels. We have the superior soil and climate; Germany superior knowledge and skill. We can easily double our present average production of cotton and corn. What is needed is better education, wider knowledge, vocational training.

Ignorance not only prevents success, it brings disaster. We have not only the largest agricultural area, but the richest and most productive soil in the world. But our virgin soils of almost unlimited original fertility have been and are being despoiled of their productive capabilities by our wasteful, improvident methods of farming. We have been stealing our stored-up wealth of nitrogen and potash and humus, and not restoring them. And restoration can easily be made by rotation of crops, by fertilization, and by better methods of cultivation. But that, too, demands knowledge, education, vocational training.

In our extension work so successfully inaugurated by our Department of Agriculture in collaboration with the State agricultural colleges, and in our experiment stations, we are taking to the adult farmer of to-day these lessons as well as we can. But the greater need is to teach the boys of to-day who will be the farmers of to-morrow these lessons so important and necessary. This is vocational education.

It is singular how educational methods have been controlled for so long in the interests of the professions and the merely theoretical branches of knowledge. It has been considered important to solve a problem in geometry, but not of any value to be able to analyze soils. It has been considered a great accomplishment to parse a sentence, but not necessary to know how to test seed corn. It has been deemed essential to name the boundaries of Bolivia, but of no importance to judge live stock. The boys' and girls' clubs have shown what a combination of scientific knowledge with youthful enthusiasm can accomplish. It is to spread abroad this knowledge, and to vivify and fuse it with the energy and ambition of all rural young America that vocational training in agriculture is intended.

IN INDUSTRY AND TRADE.

From 85 to 90 per cent of our boys in the cities leave the schools in the grades. Less than 8 per cent graduate from our high schools. Less than 3 per cent attend college.

Leaving schools as most of them do at 14 or 15 years of age, they go out into the life of the world unprepared for its duties, undeveloped in capacity, untrained in judgment. Not qualified for effective work, and unable to obtain a job, idleness like a blight settles upon them. The lure of vice and crime is ever before them. It is a wonder so many escape becoming degenerates and criminals.

It is believed that by making vocational training an adjunct and supplement of our present school work two things can be accomplished. First, it will keep the youth in school a longer period and so increase their store of general knowledge. Second, it will so vocationally prepare them that immediately on leaving school they may go into remunerative employment without the intermediate period of idleness or desultory work.

It has been well said that a vocational education helps a boy "to find himself." It enables him to become at the outset of life independent. It is democratic, because it makes skill and efficiency the criterion of success, rather than wealth or social caste. It impresses, as nothing else can, the dignity of labor. It makes idleness disgraceful and loafing a reproach and a shame. Socially it will be valuable, politically it will be beneficial, economically it will be indispensable.

In the trade wars which will surely come when the European wars shall end the nation which depends for its skilled labor upon those prepared only by the "rule of thumb" will be forced to surrender to the trained armies of industry, who will win every victory because they will be better prepared.

We are greatly concerned about our military preparedness, and are spending hundreds of millions to correct our defects in that regard. But apparently we are little concerned about our industrial preparedness. We have seen our commerce driven from the seas. We have seen the markets of the world controlled by our trade rivals. We only prosper under normal conditions by furnishing with rude work the raw material for those better trained to fashion for use. Theirs is the higher employment. Theirs is the greater profit. With the greatest opportunity, with the greatest natural resources, with the best human intelligence available in all the world, we see ourselves vanquished in every industrial campaign. Our indolence, our conceit, and want of preparation are our constant menace.

Every boy vocationally trained is a vital factor in our problems. He is taken from the waste and useless, or the dangerous and destructive class, and immediately becomes a dynamic unit making for the progress of our industries and the development of our trade. There is no investment that society can make that will yield such large dividends as an industrial organization trained and effective. There is no adjunct making for social betterment and a wider diffusion of happiness than industrious, ambitious, energetic workingmen. There is no better way to elevate and dignify labor than to train it, to educate it, to make it efficient. That is why industrial education is so necessary. That is why the Government must become interested in the vocational training of its citizens.

HOME ECONOMICS.

Home economics is a much more comprehensive term than would probably be inferred. In its broad sense it is the science of home making. It includes all those means by which the conditions of home life in America can be improved.

Elementary studies would include heat, light, water, and sanitation. Cooking, sewing, the growing of food, its preparation, and preservation; the making, purchase, care, and repair of clothing; the care of babies and children; the means and taste in making the home attractive—these are among the things that will occur to everyone.

Besides, the true home maker should know how and have the means to give first aid to the injured, should understand the preparation of foods for invalids, the value of foods that enter into daily consumption, both on the market and as body builders. She should understand ventilation, hygiene, practical physiology, the prevention of preventable diseases, house planning, laundry work, all forms of useful and decorative needlework, household decoration, and household bookkeeping.

There can be no more important work than to aid directly and efficiently in home making. Ninety out of every 100 girls in the United States leave school in the seventh and eighth grades. Without any knowledge of the practical affairs of life, without any experience except that derived from observation, they go into the world to become the mothers and home makers of America.

Under present conditions the girls' education is more directed to the making of school-teachers or shopgirls than to the making of home makers.

Medical authorities tell us that 500,000 deaths occur each year in the United States from preventable diseases. The economic waste and human suffering from illness not resulting in death that could have been avoided by a greater knowledge of hygiene and sanitation is beyond computation. The infant mortality in the United States is now about 13 for every 1,000 of the population. This could be reduced, as has been practically demonstrated, to at least 4 for every 1,000 by merely a wider diffusion of knowledge and the application of known and easily applied rules of health.

The greatest of all vocations is that of home making and motherhood. The American home is our surest safeguard, as it is our surest source of happiness. Our home makers are our real nation builders.

Every girl should be fitted for home making and for motherhood. No matter what may be the intermediate means of livelihood, it is as a wife and mother that she will attain her fullest development and fulfill her manifest destiny. It may be well for her to prepare to earn her own living, but it will be unfortunate for her and unfortunate for the Nation if she be not prepared as well for home making and motherhood. This is why the subject of home economics is of so great, so supreme importance.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take any further time of the committee unless there are some questions in the minds of Members which they desire to present.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The gentleman has studied this question and no doubt can advise me. There are some matters which have suggested themselves to my mind in connection with the bill. It is provided that the States shall in some way provide a board to give attention to the expenditure of the funds in the several States. Now, will the State boards provide the places where this money is to be expended?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. They could, if they desired, give it to one institution in the State, the university of the State, for instance?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think so under the terms of this act.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I find the State board is to file plans of the way in which the money is to be expended, and that must be approved by the national board, but I think in all probability the action of the State board in determining where it should be expended would be approved by the national board, and it seems to me that there may be danger of this fund not reaching the State at large but that it might be confined to a few.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that somewhere must rest responsibility for the distribution of the funds. If we have this double check upon an unwise distribution or application of them, it occurs to me we are pretty well guarding its use.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It seems to me that the money ought to be, by the State board, fairly distributed in all sections of the State among the institutions that are now maintaining successfully departments of agriculture and of other subjects as are provided and required to be taught by this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TOWNER. I will do so very gladly.

Mr. FESS. In reference to the application of it, no university would get any of this money save that particular portion which is intended to teach or to train the teachers for this kind of work, and the limit of that amount is $1,000,000, while $6,000,000 is to go for the payment of teachers for doing the work.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Now, the Missouri State University has a department of agriculture. Would not they get a part of this money?

Mr. FESS. Not unless it is under the college grade. There is a provision that none can go for teaching above the college grade.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I know the gentleman has given this a great deal of study.

Mr. FESS. No; it can not be applied to anything above the college grade; it has to be under the college grade.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Then, it could probably be applied to the high schools of the State which teach agriculture?

Mr. FESS. They would on the requirements of the State board; yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I understand from the gentleman it might include the high schools, but not the State universities?

Mr. FESS. Yes; those schools under public control.

Mr. TOWNER. Not exclusively the high schools. The gentleman is well aware that in many of the States consolidated rural schools are being formed that can very well use this fund, or part of it, as well as other schools under the college grade.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Well, that will meet with my approval in every way. I think it ought to be distributed over the State so as to benefit equally the people of all sections of the State.

Mr. FESS. That is the idea.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that is the principal object of this legislation. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has given a very able dissertation upon the general purposes of this bill. I think I shall take the bill up rather section by section, and I shall explain, as well as I can, the purposes of the bill as gathered from its various sections. Section 1 of the bill sets out its general purposes. It provides there shall be authorized to be annually appropriated to the States certain sums of money, which other sections of the bill set out, for the purpose of cooperating with the State in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agriculture subjects and of teachers of trade and industrial subjects and in the preparation of teachers of agriculture, trade, industrial, and home economics subjects, and there is another section—section 7—that sets out that $200,000 shall be annually appropriated for the use of the Federal board.

It will be observed, then, that section 1 sets out that the purposes of these appropriations are, first, for the paying of the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors in teaching agricultural subjects; and, second, paying the salaries of teachers in trade, home economics, and industrial subjects. The third appropriation is for the purpose of paying the salaries of teachers who instruct teachers to teach these various branches. I want to say at this point that the Committee on Education has had a meeting or two since the beginning of this session of Congress, and it was our purpose to go over this bill again section by section and see whether or not any members of the committee had any amendments to offer to the bill. The lack of time has prevented us from doing this. This bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Education on the 12th of February last. Some of us have been giving some study and investigation to it since that time, and since this bill can not be acted on until after the holidays I am going to suggest to the committee certain amendments, which, I think, ought to be incorporated in the bill, and I will do that as I go along. Then they will have an opportunity to look it over between now and the convening of Congress after the holidays. I hope we can have a meeting before Congress convenes after the holidays and go over all of them carefully.

We set out here, for instance, in section 1, that the money shall be used to pay the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects, but when we come to the teachers of home economics and industrial subjects we leave out the words "supervisors and directors." My judgment is that we have just as much use and need for paying of the salaries of supervisors and directors in the teaching of these other subjects as we do in the teaching of the subject of agriculture. And on page 1, line 9, I shall offer an amendment to add the words "supervisors and directors."

Section 2 of the bill provides that this appropriation which the Federal Government is to make shall be paid for the purpose of cooperating with the States in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects. It authorizes an appropriation of $500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, for this purpose. Each year thereafter this amount is to be increased until the year 1925, when it reaches the sum of $3,000,000, and annually thereafter $3,000,000 is to be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield there?

Mr. POWERS. Very gladly.

Mr. FESS. The agricultural work admits, or rather invites, the supervisor and the director, because the recitation work would be done largely in the winter months, and the demonstration work, under the head of director or supervisor, would be in the spring and fall months, when farming could be properly done, outside, of course, of the wintertime.

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Now, we saw no particular reason why the Government should furnish money for directors and supervisors of trade and industrial teaching, largely because those people do not exist as they do in the agricultural work. We would be legally creating what are not now in existence. And that is why the commission, before it got to the committee, omitted "director and supervisor of trade and industrial subjects."

Mr. POWERS. I will say to the gentleman that it is not my purpose at this particular time to enter into a discussion of the reasons for the amendments which I propose to offer. I hope to do that when we consider the bill under the five-minute rule. I do not want to consume too much of the time of the House, and it will take a good deal of time to explain the provisions of the bill section by section. I thank the gentleman, however, for the information he has extended.

Now, this $3,000,000 that is to be paid in salaries for the teachers of these agricultural subjects annually is to be apportioned to the various States in the proportion that the entire rural population of a particular State bears to the entire rural population of the United States, not including the outlying possessions. This bill further provides that up to 1923 from the time this act takes effect that no State shall receive less than $5,000 in its allotment, and from 1923 it shall not receive less than $10,000. The idea of the commission was that money less than those amounts going to a State would not be of any practical value.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I gladly yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. How is this money expended in the States under this provision? Suppose the gentleman's State of Kentucky was to get $30,000 or $40,000. To whom does that go, and what authority in your State says how it shall be contributed or used and in what schools it will be used?

Mr. POWERS. This bill provides in section 5, I believe it is, that the legislatures of the various States must accept by legislative enactment the provisions of this bill and create or designate what is known as a State board composed of not less than three parties. Now, this State board will act as the agent of the State. This Federal board will act as the agent of the Federal Government in working out, or applying, rather, the provisions of this bill, if it should become a law.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. There is no provision in this bill, is there, providing for the payment to any State its share of this fund until the State by legislative act provides some way for paying a like amount out of the State funds?

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Now, the question I asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] a moment ago I would like to ask you; don't you think this bill should be amended so as to provide in some way that my State and other States shall not lose their part of this fund pending the session of the legislature, that may not convene for two years or more after this bill becomes a law?

There is $500,000 to be paid, I believe, in this fiscal year under this bill?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir. More than that.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Five hundred thousand dollars in this fiscal year, as I understand.

Mr. FESS. Three times five hundred thousand dollar funds; total, $1,500,000.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Whatever it may be. The legislature of my State will convene now in about two weeks, and it sits only 70 days, and it will probably adjourn before this becomes a law. There will be no other session of the legislature unless a special session is called. What is the probability of the State of Missouri getting its share of this fund pending the session of the legislature that may be two years off?

Mr. POWERS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that section 5 sets out that after June 30, 1918, no State shall receive any appropriation for salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects, unless it has complied with the provisions of this law in regard to paying the salaries of teachers to train teachers to teach these subjects.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] that that ought to be moved up a little bit; that 1918 will not possibly be time enough to give the various States opportunity by legislative enactment to accept the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The State of Mississippi has a session of the legislature but once in four years.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The limit of 1918, there, is applied to this provision?

Mr. POWERS. Yes; as to preparing teachers to teach.

Mr. FESS. It is provided that if any State does not care to accept all these features, the agricultural training and the trade and economic teaching, it can take any one of the three; but the States are required to use but the portion for 1918 for the training of teachers. Otherwise they can not get what they want. In other words, if they do not use the portion for teaching up to 1918, they can not have an option.

I think, with my colleague, it is proper for us to move that date up so as to include the situation that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] says exists there, and the situation that Alabama has and Mississippi also. I think that can very easily be done. The funds will be cumulative, however, so that the States will not lose it. If they can not take advantage of it immediately, they can take advantage of it later on.

Mr. POWERS. If any State should take advantage of this provision as to preparing teachers to teach, later on, they can take advantage of that part relating to the payment of salaries of the teachers to teach, either in these agricultural subjects or the trade subjects or economic subjects. All that they are required to do before 1918 is take advantage of that part of the fund providing that they shall expend so much in the preparation of teachers to teach. So far as the other two divisions of it are concerned, I know of no other limitation than this.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, in the gentleman's response to the question of my colleague [Mr. HASTINGS] he explained one part of his question, but in order to get it direct I wish to ask him this: Is there anything in the bill that fixes a uniform method of instruction and industry? Is not that left, in other words, to be changed by the boards on the part of the States and the Federal Government?

Mr. POWERS. I shall be glad to point out to the gentleman from Oklahoma, and also to other gentlemen, the provisions of the bill touching that particular question. As I said a moment ago, section 5 provides that the legislature shall accept the provisions of this act and appoint a State board of not less than three people to cooperate with the Federal Government in carrying out the provisions of the law.

Now, this State board is to formulate all the plans for the expenditure of this money. They are to set out what the qualifications of the teachers shall be to teach these various subjects. The State shall provide the equipment and the buildings, and all that. In these plans the State board sets out what subjects are to be taught, except what this bill a little later on sets out. The purpose of this act, so far as the teaching of agricultural subjects is concerned, is to provide training for useful employment. No part of a college grade shall be taught. The pupils shall be over 14 years of age. These State boards shall arrange their program and plans and present them to the Federal board. The Federal board will make sure that the money is expended for teaching agricultural subjects. Such persons only as are entering upon agricultural life or are preparing to enter upon agricultural life or farm-home making are to be taught. These plans will all be submitted to the Federal board. They will either approve or reject them. So far as placing the money in any particular part of a particular State is concerned, or in any particular school, that is left entirely to the State board.

Mr. MURRAY. It does not follow under the law that each State has to have the same plan?

Mr. POWERS. No. Each State submits its own plans. This bill specifically provides that the State may take advantage of one or another of the funds, submitting its own plans, but it must take advantage of the provision requiring the preparation of the teacher within a given period, or it loses the chance to participate in the other funds.

Mr. MURRAY. Has the gentleman noticed the provisions of the Davis bill of a few years ago?

Mr. POWERS. I have not. Other Members may have done so.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, referring further to the inquiry of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], the bill provides in section 13, I will say to the gentleman, that the fund is to be delivered to the State treasurer of each State, and it is to be by him disbursed as he may determine in conjunction with the action of the State commission. It is not expected that the requirements will be uniform in the various States. In fact the contrary is expected. It is expected that between the commission here in Washington and the commission of the particular State to be affected they may by conference agree upon the proper disposition of that fund, providing they come under the requirements of the act.

Mr. POWERS. Yes. I thank the gentleman for his further explanation.

Now, referring to section 3. That section provides for the authorization of an appropriation finally to be $3,000,000 annually to be paid in salaries to teachers for the purpose of teaching trades, home economics, and industrial subjects. In other words, $3,000,000 annually, beginning with the year 1925, is to go to the teaching of agricultural subjects under section 2, and under section 3, $3,000,000 is to go annually to the teaching of all three of these subjects—trades, home economics, and industrial subjects.

Section 4 of the bill acts upon a somewhat different theory, just a little bit. That provides that for the purpose of cooperating with the States in preparing teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects, and of teachers of trades, industrial and home economic subjects, there shall be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, $500,000. This is increased until the year 1920, when it reaches a million dollars, and it stays at a million dollars each year thereafter. In other words, this is the section which authorizes the money to be appropriated to be paid teachers to train other teachers to teach these various subjects, agricultural, home economics, and industrial subjects.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. COX. As I understand it, all this money is to be paid over by the Federal Government to the State board of education in the State, and then it is to be paid out upon order of the State board. Is that correct?

Mr. POWERS. That is hardly correct. As I understand the bill, these State boards act merely as the agents of the States. Now, this money is to be paid to the treasurer of each State, and the legislature of the State must designate that the treasurer of the State shall be the treasurer of this fund, and the treasurer of the State shall pay out the money upon the order of the State board, with the approval of the Federal board.

Mr. COX. Then, instead of my question being answered in the affirmative, it should have been answered, I presume, in the negative, that the salaries of these people employed for the purpose of qualifying teachers to teach the various things here set out in this bill will be paid on the order of the board or commission provided for in this bill.

Mr. POWERS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. COX. They will fix the salaries?

Mr. POWERS. With the approval of the Federal board.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I understand that this bill is patterned after the technical schools in Germany, to give scientific, technical education. Am I right about that?

Mr. POWERS. So far as the teaching of the people to enter useful employment is concerned, it is patterned after the system in Germany.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That being true, should not this bill provide for a uniform system in all the States rather than leave it to the States to provide the system?

Mr. POWERS. The committee felt—and I think the commission felt—that the various interests in the States were so diversified that it would be a rather difficult thing to frame a bill that would cover all the various States uniformly.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I am in favor of the principle of the bill.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] would like to know whether this bill would compel them to work eight hours?

Mr. BORLAND. I should like to ask whether it would tend to educate men away from the idea of working eight hours? [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. I do not think it considers the exact number of hours that anybody shall work. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and also of the other members of the committee to this suggestion which I want to offer at the proper time. On page 6, line 4, we use the word "preparing" teachers, supervisors, directors, and so forth, to teach.

Now, as I understand it, this appropriation on the part of the Federal Government is to be used in paying the salaries of teachers engaged in the training of teachers to teach. The word "preparing" is perhaps broader than the idea we want to convey. To prepare means to provide with what is appropriate and necessary—to equip and fit out. I think we ought to strike out the word "preparing" and in its place insert the word "training." I think that is the purpose of the committee—to pay the salaries of teachers, supervisors and directors engaged in training teachers to teach, and I believe that word conveys the idea more clearly.

Section 5 of the bill has virtually been gone over. It provides how the State shall accept the provisions of this bill, by legislative enactment, and create or designate its State board. It further provides how any one State can accept one of the funds or benefits under and not accept under another, provided it prepares its teachers to teach. It must do that.

And I want to suggest further to the chairman of the committee that the word "until," on page 8, line 7, should, I think, be "unless"; and the same thing is true in line 13, page 8.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I gladly yield.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman would just as lief, I would suggest to him that the members of the committee had an informal conference, at which we endeavored to secure the gentleman's presence, but we could not find him, before taking up this bill; and if he will be kind enough to reserve section 6, which refers to the constitution of the board, until we can have an opportunity of talking it over, perhaps it will be better all around, unless that interferes with the gentleman's plan.

Mr. POWERS. It does not interfere at all, except in this particular, that I wish to offer an amendment to this section of the bill, and I thought I might have that read, so that it would appear in the RECORD, in order that the committee might have a chance to look at it during the holiday recess if they desired to do so. However, if the committee feel that we ought to have an informal conference, I will not offer it at this time.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The bill provides, as the gentleman has just stated, that a State may accept either one of these three objects for which the money is to be expended—that is, agriculture, trade, or economics. There are three divisions, and a State may accept either one or all.

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. If they accept one, does that mean that they get one-third, or can they get the entire amount?

Mr. POWERS. Section 2 provides that so much shall be appropriated to teach agricultural subjects and section 3 provides that so much shall be appropriated to teach other subjects. It is separated into different amounts.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I see.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to comply with the committee's request, so far as section 6 is concerned. I thought I would put forth the amendment which I have and will offer at the proper time. I will put it in the RECORD so as to let the membership have a chance to read it, unless the committee want me to withhold it.

Mr. LENROOT. I would be glad to have the gentleman do that. I would like to get the gentleman's ideas on this section.

Mr. POWERS. I will state that section 6 is possibly the section that will create the most contention. The Senate has enacted Senate bill 703, and it provides in section 6 that the Postmaster General, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Commerce shall constitute the Federal board. The Commissioner of Education shall also be one of the members.

The bill as presented by the Committee on Education has taken a different plan. Our bill provides that the Commissioner of Education shall be the chairman of this board; that there shall be four other members appointed by the President, no more than two of whom shall affiliate with one political party. After giving this subject very careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that neither one of these suggestions should be adopted, but that we ought to have a different sort of a board. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment, which I will offer at the proper time along this line.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 6, on page 8, from lines 17 to 25, inclusive, and the words "per annum," first line on page 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That a Federal board for vocational education is hereby created, to consist of five citizens of the United States, four of whom shall be appointed by the President. Not more than three members of said board shall be of any one political party. One of these members shall be an employer of labor engaged in manufacturing, one an employer engaged in commercial pursuits other than manufacturing, one a representative of labor, and one a person engaged in agriculture. The Commissioner of Education shall be a member of the board. The board shall elect annually one of its members as chairman.

"In the first instance one of the members of the board shall be appointed for six years, one for five years, one for four years, one for three years, and the successors in office of such officers shall be appointed for a term of six years.

"The members of the board shall be paid for their services on the board a salary at the rate of $5,000 per year, said salary to be paid out of the money appropriated for the work of the board in section 7 of this act: Provided, That the Commissioner of Education shall not receive for his services as commissioner and as a member of the board a total annual salary of more than $7,000."

Mr. POWERS. I shall make no further comment on the proposed amendment at this time further than to say that the Senate bill contains this provision:

That there shall be selected by the board, among other assistants, a specialist on vocational education, to be the director of all vocational educational work, at a salary of $7,500 per year; a specialist in agricultural education, at a salary of $7,000 per year; a specialist in education in trades and industries, at a salary of $7,000; a specialist in education in home economics, at a salary of $5,000; a specialist in commercial education, at a salary of $7,500 per year, who shall be paid out of the appropriations provided for in section 7.

The bill that we have presented to the House does not contain any section along this line, but merely provides, as I said awhile ago, that the Commissioner of Education shall be the chairman of the board, and that the other members shall be appointed by the President. My judgment is that if our bill is finally accepted we ought to have a provision in it in the way of covering not exactly this provision in the bill but something along this line. I will ask the Clerk to read that.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, following line 19, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 6b. It shall be mandatory upon the Federal board for vocational education to appoint from time to time advisory committees made up of persons representing industry, commerce, labor, agriculture, home-making or general or vocational education, to assist them by advice in the administration of this act; but not more than $50,000 shall be expended by the board in any fiscal year for this purpose."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the membership that this bill was unanimously reported out by the Committee on Education, and, whether any of these amendments that I propose are adopted or not, I shall support the bill. I regard it as one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation that has been presented for the consideration of this body since I have been a Member of it.

Section 7 of the bill provides that an annual appropriation of $200,000 shall go to this Federal board for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act, and the duties of the Federal board are set out in section 6. It provides:

It shall be the duty of the Federal board for vocational education to make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports, with particular reference to their use in aiding the States in the establishment of vocational schools and classes and in giving instruction in agriculture, trades and industries, commerce and commercial pursuits, and home economics.

This money is to be expended largely along that line.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The Senate bill provided this board of experts for investigation.

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The commission authorized that power without specifying who those persons should be. The only difference between the House bill and the gentleman's proposition is that the House bill carries that power, and this section appropriates the $200,000 for the purpose, and we thought it was a little better to omit specifying that there should be a board made up of specialists, but to leave that with the Federal board to use its discretion, so that I think what the Senate has in its bill and what the gentleman suggests in his amendment is already carried, in fact I know it is carried, within the section, but it is not specified. That is the only difference.

Mr. POWERS. The section, as I understand it, provides that this board shall employ whatever assistance, and so forth, may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. FESS. And those provisions to be carried out are to make these special studies or investigations which the gentleman mentioned a moment ago. The provision of the Senate bill to which I refer is as follows:

Such studies, investigations, and reports shall include agriculture and agricultural processes and requirements upon agricultural workers; trades, industries, and apprenticeships; trade and industrial requirements upon industrial workers, and classification of industrial processes and pursuits; commerce and commercial pursuits and requirements upon commercial workers; home processes and problems and requirements upon home workers; and problems of administration of vocational schools and of courses of study and instruction in vocational subjects; and problems, requirements, and methods for the proper training of foreign-born persons for intelligent citizenship and industrial efficiency.

The difference is that we have specified what is to be done, while the Senate bill appoints this special board to be paid out of the $200,000 appropriation, and as I understand the gentleman's amendment, it is something approaching the Senate bill. However, we thought it would be better, specifying what is to be done, to allow the latitude in the Federal board to appoint these commissioners, rather than to have them appointed by virtue of authority granted here.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman refers to my second amendment?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the last one.

Mr. POWERS. I would remind the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that section 7 of the bill further points out that the Federal board for vocational education may allot any part of such appropriation to any United States department or bureau, for the purpose of making any study or investigation or any part thereof under the provisions of the act.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. In other words, if this board should be composed of educators as suggested, with the Commissioner of Education, of course, himself an educator, it would be within the power of the board to allot the entire $200,000, or any part of it it might deem proper to the Bureau of Education to make these investigations. Those of us who are afraid that a Federal board would be appointed largely of educators believe that this section 6 should be so amended that the great industries of the country that this bill proposes to try to reach and help should have representation on the board, and that they should be called in from the fields of agriculture, and that the commercial interests should be represented, and that the educational interests should be represented. The purpose of the bill is to reach and prepare the students for useful employment. That is the idea of it; that is the foundation of it; that is the reason of its existence. Statistics show that less than 2 per cent of the students who enter the schools finally go through college or the university. Statistics further show that of the people who finally enter the high schools not 1 in 10 ever go through the high schools of this country.

Mr. FESS. I am aware of those figures.

Mr. POWERS. Forty per cent of the students leave school before they reach the age of 14 years. Seventy per cent leave before they reach the age of 15 years and 85 per cent leave before they reach the age of 16 years. Now, this bill specifically provides that none of this money shall be used in teaching folks in the college grade, and it specifically provides that the purposes of this appropriation, the meaning of the act and the reason for its existence, is to teach the students some useful trade at which they can make a living with their hands after they leave the schools at the ages of 14 to 16 years. I now gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I was referring not to the gentleman's amendment on section 6, but I was referring to the amendment that was given in lieu of the Senate amendment providing for specialists.

Mr. POWERS. It was not necessarily in lieu of the Senate amendment, I beg the gentleman's pardon, and if our bill goes through as we have framed it we will still leave the entire discretion to the board, the Commissioner of Education, and the four people to be appointed by the President. There is no provision in our bill at all along the line that the Senate has or along the line of the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. FESS. The power is in the section?

Mr. POWERS. The power is there. I agree that the power is there.

Mr. FESS. Now, would my friend yield?

Mr. POWERS. I will gladly yield.

Mr. FESS. In the discussion of the constitution of the Federal board there were a great variety of opinions. One man to whom we felt like yielding considerably wanted an ex officio board entirely and wanted the executive officer of that board the Commissioner of Education in the belief that nearly all the work would be done by the commissioner and the ex officio board would be made up of Cabinet members in order that we might work through these various executives heads. That was that contention. Then there were others who wanted a board of three ex officio members and four associate members, one of them to be the commissioner and the three ex officio members were to be the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. They wanted to link up the associate members, who would be the working element, with the governing authority of those three departments. Then there was still another contention, that we ought to have it organized on the basis of the Federal Reserve Board and let the ex officio members be the Secretary of the Interior, then let his subordinate, the Commissioner of Education, be a member of the board, and four other associates and have, say, the Secretary of the Interior at the head, the Commissioner of Education, and the four associates, so there was not any serious contention. It was just simply a sort of compromise and I do not think that the committee is going to be insistent at all upon any particular one of these.

Mr. POWERS. As I said to the gentleman from Ohio, I propose to support the bill whether any of these amendments are adopted or not. I simply offer them at this time so that members of the committee as well as Members of the House may have a chance to consider them if they desire.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I will yield.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to section 7 and the maintaining of these advisory committees. If I understood the gentleman he conceded in reply to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that under section 7 this board would be entirely free to appoint such advisory committees as have been mentioned by the gentleman. I want to ask him whether under section 7 the Federal board is not practically directed, in connection with the language of section 6, to make all of these investigations, through existing departments, and without some amendment there is not that discretion of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. POWERS. I am not quite sure whether they are virtually directed to do it or not, but they have the power to do it.

Mr. LENROOT. The language is that they are required "so far as practical" to make these studies through these various departments.

Mr. POWERS. I believe that is the language of the section itself.

Now, I do not want to occupy too much of the time of this committee. I will speak of one further matter, and then if there are any questions——

Mr. HASTINGS. Before the gentleman gets away from the board that is provided for in section 6 of this act, I wish to say that I do not see any length of time for which this board can be appointed reported to the House. Is it four years?

Mr. POWERS. I think there is a provision covering that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Where is that found?

Mr. FESS. In section 6.

Mr. POWERS. Four years is the time.

Mr. TOWNER. It is found in line 22, page 8.

Mr. HASTINGS. I see; the last two lines at the bottom of page 8.

Mr. POWERS. I have a suggestion and observation that I would like to make concerning section 8. It provides that in order to secure the benefits of the appropriation for any of the purposes specified in this act the State board shall prepare plans showing the kinds of vocational education for which it is proposed that the appropriation shall be used, the kinds of schools and equipments, courses of study, methods of instruction, qualifications of teachers, and so forth, and that these plans are subject to the approval of the Federal board.

Here is one suggestion I want to offer to the chairman and the other members of the committee, and that is this, that this section as it now stands puts it up to the Federal board to accept the plans provided for by the State boards. They can either accept or reject, as they see fit. But there is nothing in the section which gives the Federal board the power to pass upon the real work done in the schools. The plans of the various States might be satisfactory, and yet the real work of the school might be very far from satisfactory. I think that not only the plans put up to us by the State boards should be satisfactory, but that the real work to be done in the schools should meet the approval of the Federal board.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. POWERS. I gladly yield.

Mr. FESS. That provision says "plans," and then it goes on with other features, such as teachers, qualifications, methods of teaching, and so on.

Mr. POWERS. That is true.

Mr. FESS. And I think the results of the work would fall under that. I think that what my colleague said is pertinent, but I believe it is included in the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Well, these things ought to be submitted by the State board. I agree with my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that the qualifications of teachers and plans and methods, and all that, are to be submitted by the State board. In other words, under the word "plans" these things are all included; and if these plans "meet the provisions of this act"—is the language here—if the plans submitted be in conformity with the provisions of this act, then it is up to the Federal board to approve the plans. The point I make is that the plans might be all there, and at the same time the quality of the teaching, the worth of the thing done, might be far from meeting the approval of the Federal board.

Mr. FESS. If any one of these items, like the method of teaching, would fall below the requirements of the Federal board, the Federal board could cure it by refusing the Federal allowance until that was corrected.

Mr. POWERS. That is very true.

Mr. FESS. And I was going to say, too, that that provision answers the question raised by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] a while ago as to the uniformity. The plan does not have to be uniform in all the States.

Mr. POWERS. I understand.

Mr. FESS. As the Members said, there was a great diversity.

Mr. POWERS. My suggestion is that the plan should not only meet the approval of the Federal board but the real work done should meet its approval.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the language covering that idea is as follows:

The State board shall make an annual report to the Federal board for vocational education on or before September 1 of each year on the work done in the State and the receipts and expenditures of money under the provisions of this act.

That is at the bottom of page 11.

Mr. POWERS. That may cover the work done.

Mr. FESS. There is another provision, that when it does not meet the approval of the Federal board the State board will be punished by receiving no further allowance.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say that this does not provide that State boards shall report to the Federal board on the work done. I think the language does cover that item.

Mr. POWERS. I am inclined to think that the gentleman from Missouri is correct in his contention, as well as the gentleman from Ohio. I had failed to note carefully that section of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless there is some further question, I shall not occupy further time of the House. There are others here who desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky yields back the remainder of his time.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to go into the details of this bill now pending before the House. That has already been thoroughly done, first, by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education at the last session of this Congress, and next at this session by my learned friend, Dr. FESS, of Ohio, during the general debate on the Indian appropriation bill. Both of these gentlemen were members of the original commission which investigated this subject very carefully and exhaustively.

What I shall attempt to do in the brief time allotted to me is to point out the vital connection between his proposed legislation and certain other questions that have been engrossing the minds of the American people.

Throughout the last session of Congress the question uppermost in our minds was that of national preparedness. We were particularly concerned and the people of the country were particularly concerned with military and naval preparedness. Congress voted the largest appropriations for the Army and Navy ever made in the whole course of our history. In order to meet the demands of this expensive program for national defense we were obliged to resort to greatly increased taxation, thus diminishing the wealth of the Nation for purposes of destruction without any provision for replenishing the loss thus created. It must be evident that if we are to continue along this line—and the exigencies of the times in which we live seem to render it necessary—there must be a conservation of our national resources, another problem in regard to which much has been spoken and written in recent years.

A great deal of attention has been devoted to the conservation of our forests, our mines, and our water power, but very little regard has been paid to the conservation of our labor supply, upon which all production in the last analysis depends.

In this regard we are far behind the other great nations of the earth. The census of 1910 shows that in the United States only 38 per cent of the population were bread winners, whereas in France the percentage was 48; in Italy, 53; and in Austria, 55. In Great Britain 64 per cent of the population are engaged in manufacturing, mining, trade, and commerce, whereas in the United States it is only 40 per cent. More important than the construction of battleships and the purchase of munitions of war is the conversion of our large percentage of idle consumers into producers of national wealth. Hundreds of thousands of boys who are now running wild in our large cities can by industrial education be turned from paths of vice and crime into self-respecting, self-supporting, and contented, productive laborers. Moreover, while each year 3,000,000 boys and girls graduate from our elementary schools, an equal number, most of them less than 14 years of age, leave school by the end of the sixth grade, not fitted in any way to earn a livelihood and without any particular aim in life. Not only that, but a large proportion of those who do graduate from the elementary schools and have the opportunity to secure a high-school or academic education are fitted only for general clerical work, and help only to still further increase the supply of a kind of labor already very much underpaid. Everywhere there are thousands of young men wasting their efforts along unprofitable lines of endeavor who would be valuable members of society if they could only have had the advantages of a special training in their earlier years.

Mr. Chairman, I am very proud of the fact that my city of Cambridge, Mass., was almost the first, if not the first, city in this country to establish a manual training school, known the country over as the Rindge Technical School. Over the main door of that school building, which was given to us by the generosity of one of our public-spirited citizens, in letters of gold are written these words:

Work is one of our greatest blessings. Everyone should have an honest occupation.

Now, the great purpose of this bill, the great fundamental principle underlying this bill, is to promote industrial education, not in our colleges, because a very large percentage of our boys and girls never have an opportunity to go to college, but in our secondary schools, and that sort of industrial education is absolutely essential to the conservation of our national resources and to any real national preparedness.

Another question in which a great many people are interested is the divorce evil, which has come to be a national scandal. Now, it is a well known fact that a very large proportion of the divorces in this country to-day might have been avoided if the girls had been good home makers. One of the objects of this bill is to establish throughout the country the teaching of home economics in our public schools so that the women of to-morrow may become good home makers and good mothers. It is estimated that every year at least 500,000 infants die under 2 years of age in the United States, while at the same time millions of children fail to reach their best physical development because their mothers and fathers do not understand how to properly care for them. Moreover, it has been estimated by the American School of Home Economics that at least $1,000,000,000 of the $10,000,000,000 annually spent in this country for food, clothing, and shelter could, with greater knowledge and efficiency, be saved and added to the productive wealth of the Nation. The possible economic saving to the people of the United States as a result of the scientific teaching of home economics is beyond calculation.

Still another question which has assumed very great importance and is at the present moment engrossing public attention is the high cost of living. One of the principal reasons for the increase in the cost of food products is the fact that our agricultural production has not kept pace with the increase in population. This in turn is due to the fact that a larger and larger proportion of our population are becoming consumers and a constantly smaller proportion are becoming producers. In support of this statement I wish to read from the testimony of Mr. Joseph Chapman, jr., chairman of the committee of northwestern State agricultural colleges, at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in March, 1912, which was referred to by Senator PAGE, of Vermont, the pioneer in the movement for vocational education, in a speech delivered in the Senate in 1912:

We found our boys and girls were leaving the farms and going to the cities. In Minnesota one-third of the population of that State lived in three cities. We went about to find out the reasons why the boys and girls were leaving the farms and flocking to the cities, leaving our men and their wives, who ran the farms, without help, or with very incompetent hired help. It was a discouraging situation. At the Hull House, in Chicago, last June a man made a canvass of the chief lodging houses in that city and found that there were 20,000 young men under the age of 25 who were sleeping in basements where the water would ooze up through the floors and where they would lie down to sleep with nothing but a newspaper between them and the floor. Those young men were from the farms of our Central States—men looking for jobs in cities. We reached the conclusion that it was largely an educational problem. We found in Minnesota that in 1909 there were 435,000 children of all ages in our schools, which schools were conducted at an expense of about $14,000,000 to the State. Of that 435,000, Mr. Chairman, 1,832 were in our agricultural schools and colleges. In other words, Minnesota was educating 99.6 per cent of the coming generation to be consumers and four-tenths of 1 per cent to be producers, and if you think those figures are exaggerated and do not fit in there, look into the situation in your own State, and you will find Minnesota is not alone.

We have drifted away from practical education and have gotten largely into theoretical and what is called intellectual education, so that the problem in Minnesota is now to get the knowledge from the agricultural schools in our great States out to the 1,000,000 people who live on the farms in the State of Minnesota. There are $400,000,000 worth of products produced annually by these million people living on the farms, and yet Minnesota practically stood still in her rural population in the last 10 years, while the great States of Iowa and Missouri dropped backward.

But, gentlemen, it is going to take a very long time before this information is going to percolate and get to the people under our present methods. In our own school system in the State of Minnesota we have changed in the last three years. There are now in Minnesota 80 high schools where agriculture, domestic science, and vocational training are taught, and the reason there are not more is because we can not get the instructors.

Mr. Chairman, it is the main purpose of this bill to provide the several States with a sufficient number of teachers competent to teach these very subjects.

Another reason for the high cost of the necessaries of life is the inefficiency of our agriculture, as a result of which we do not get anywhere near as much production from our farms as we should. In support of this statement I wish to call your attention to a table showing the increase in yield of five staple crops in Germany and the United States, from 1878 to 1909, to be found on page 13 of Senate Document No. 76, Sixty-second Congress, first session.

Increase in yield of five staple crops in Germany and the United States.

	Germany.		United States.		Increase.
	1878–1883	1909	1879	1909	Germany.	United States.	Germany.	United States.
	Bushels per acre.	Bushels per acre.	Bushels per acre.	Bushels per acre.	Bushels.	Bushels.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Rye	15.7	29.4	14.5	16.1	13.7	1.6	87.2	10.9
Wheat	19.2	30.5	13.8	15.8	11.3	2.0	58.8	14.2
Barley	24.5	39.4	24.0	24.3	14.9	.3	60.8	1.2
Oats	31.8	59.1	28.7	30.3	27.7	1.6	85.8	6.7
Potatoes	115.5	208.9	98.9	106.8	93.4	7.6	80.8	7.6

From this table the following facts appear:

In rye Germany increased her production 87 per cent, the United States only 10 per cent.

In wheat Germany increased her production 58 per cent, the United States only 14 per cent.

In barley Germany increased her production 60 per cent, the United States only 1 per cent.

In oats Germany increased her production 85 per cent, the United States only 6 per cent.

In potatoes Germany increased her production 80 per cent, the United States only 7 per cent.

The Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for 1914 shows that in the year 1913 the Empire of Germany, with an area equal to Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri, produced more barley, almost twelve times as much rye, three-fifths as much oats, and more than six times as many potatoes as we do in the whole United States.

In 1913 Germany had 44,213,000 acres sowed to wheat, barley, rye, oats, and potatoes and harvested therefrom 3,498,775,000 bushels, while from 102,307,000 acres sowed to the same crops in the United States American farmers harvested only 2,436,243,000 bushels. In other words, from considerably less than one-half of the area German farmers harvested more than 1,000,000,000 more bushels.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman state how long it has been that Germany put on foot her industrial and mechanical training schools?

Mr. DALLINGER. I can not tell the gentleman exactly. I know that it has been for at least a generation.

Mr. POWERS. It has been about 30 years.

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes; that is what I understand. The fact that Germany has been cultivating her soil for centuries proves conclusively that our lands may be made to double their yield by progressive and scientific farming.

The Republic of France has the same area as three of our greatest wheat-producing States—Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota. In 1913 France sowed 16,166,000 acres to wheat, while the three States in question sowed to the same crop 18,420,000 acres. In the same year the French farmers harvested 321,000,000 bushels, or 20 bushels to the acre, while the farmers of Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota obtained only 233,878,000 bushels, or 12.9 bushels to the acre.

In short, what we need in this country to meet the problem of the high cost of living is more farmers and better farmers, and this bill properly administered will give us both.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will mean better homes, better men and women, and a better citizenship. The bill itself is a genuine measure for the conservation of our natural resources without any confiscation of private capital. It establishes a kind of national preparedness that is not destructive, but constructive. Its wise administration will inevitably result in an abundant food supply and hence a lower cost of living for the masses of our people. In short, it is a wise, comprehensive, and farsighted piece of legislation for the common welfare of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, education of the masses is the imperative requirement of every democracy. Without it no government of and by the whole people can be good or successful. When the masses are without education, democracy is in danger, and the liberties of the whole people are threatened.

The education required for successful self-government is not mere literacy and acquaintance with letters, the ability to read and write; it must include training to think, to reason, and to decide upon public questions. Ability to read is in itself a source of danger when the power to discriminate, to accept the true and reject the false, does not accompany it.

Always the affairs of government have been under the control of the few, of a small class which by reason of its wealth, prestige, and superior opportunity was able to impose its will upon the many. In former years the few were able to control public affairs through selfish or corrupt bosses and similar influences. With the spread of literacy the many have been reached and public opinion has been controlled through the press and other printed propaganda. Though the form of the government be a democracy, it is plain that there can be no real and effective democracy unless the masses are trained to think for themselves, to have the courage of their convictions, and to reject the poison which selfish interests are able to distill through the corrupt newspaper and the false printed page.

Education in its broad sense has no particular relation to letters. A man is not educated merely because he is filled with the lore of schools and familiar with books. Education in the big sense is training, training in self-control of mind and heart and hand. A man may be illiterate and yet have a mind so trained that he may set it to grapple with a problem, as a skilled workman would use his hand upon a machine. We of the latter time are too prone to look upon the knowledge of printed books as all sufficient and to lose sight of the great purpose of true education which is to fit a man for the duties and responsibilities of life so that all the world may be happier and better because he has lived.

Education in its narrow scholastic sense is merely a kit of tools which enables the mental workman to perform his task more easily. The illiterate man goes into life with his bare hands. He can not use the tools fashioned by the experience of others. He must make his own ax with only rough stones to shape it. His hammer, his saw, and his plane are created by his own experiments, with his bare hands and of crude materials. That an illiterate man may do fine work is possible; that his task is more difficult and requires a higher ingenuity, greater initiative, and more industry and determined effort is absolutely sure.

In every civilized community in the world the State either in its general or local form has assumed responsibility for many of the phases of liberal education, especially those of an elementary grade in which the large majority of children are concerned. It is an accepted principle of social organization that the State should encourage individuals to develop and exercise all those functions which are useful to society. Private agencies like the home, the church, the press, the stage, and the library contribute much to liberal education, but it has been demonstrated that many elements of liberal education can be guaranteed to all alike only through State action.

In progressive communities the State is also assuming responsibility for phases of physical education. This is evidenced by laws requiring the teaching of hygiene; by public control of such phases of school environment as seating, building, textbooks, facilities for play, and other factors of a hygienic nature; and, finally, by the development of a medical inspection of school children and the use of school nurses to make this medical inspection effective. Though this physical education is not, directly speaking, a part of liberal education it is expected to react on it and it also possesses ends of its own which justify State action.

By vocational education is meant all that training and instruction whose controlling purpose is to enhance in a permanent fashion the productive capacity of the individual. Vocational education thus aims primarily at developing the capacity for self-support and capacity to produce a surplus, but it also aims to insure that capacity for self-support which shall be of a prolonged character, and, at least, not antagonistic to physical, civic, and cultural well-being. That is vocational education which aims to train the producer, the worker, the wage earner in different callings. Education for law, medicine, salesmanship, stenography, farming, stock raising, trades, factory specialties, or household management is all vocational education. Vocational education may aim to give not merely the immediate technique, skill, knowledge, and insight necessary, but also to give the general intelligence, the ideals and appreciations of civic situations, and the physical wholesomeness which will insure, as far as practicable, growth in productive capacity, satisfaction in work, and the capacity to develop and maintain good social relations with other producers, whether fellow workers, employees, employers, or consumers. Though vocational education and liberal education may have essentially different aims they mutually reenforce each other. Any division of organized knowledge or skill may be made an end either of vocational or of liberal study. Music is a vocational study for the musician, and a liberal study for workers in other fields. Cotton manufacturing may be studies for cultural purposes by boys and girls destined for other callings or for vocational purposes by those who are to specialize as producers in this field. To the workingman some study of law may have a cultural or civic significance, but such study is vocational mainly for the lawyer.

It is the highest duty of governments to concern themselves with the education which will fit their people for citizenship. Such education no less includes the ability to earn a livelihood than the knowledge of letters which gives the individual a larger outlook on life. Man's first necessity is for bread. That he must have. It is a mockery to take up the child's time with a training which leaves him at its end unable to earn a living. A minimum of necessaries of food, clothing, and shelter is essential to peace, good order, and the public welfare. Every interest of public health, economics, and spirituality is bound up with the well-being of the humblest member of society.

Education needs to be practical and for a certain and definite purpose. College men are often scoffed at as being unfitted for any useful vocation, as having been taught a smattering of many things with a thorough knowledge of nothing. Education as a whole is less popular with the masses because of the general impression that it is based on faulty principles. There is much ground for this criticism. Too close have we adhered to the idea that education is designed to make "a scholar and a gentleman" instead of a useful man. Too closely have we followed the old ideal of seeking by our schools to duplicate the type of the English country squire, an amiable, accomplished, brave, and high-minded parasite on society.

I have often feared that certain sections of America have followed the old ideals in education more closely even than the people of the Old World. We have been more conservative even than they. Too much are our boys encouraged to enter the professions. More brains is frequently required in business and industry than in professional life, and the rewards are greater. Frequently a high-class and useful mechanic is spoiled in the making of an indifferent physician or lawyer. Ridicule is sometime heaped on professional men that they are more poorly paid than a good mechanic; but this is not a matter for sneers nor even for comment, for often the mechanic is the more useful citizen and frequently expends more talent and energy in his work than the professional man in his calling. Even our trade schools are devoted too much to teaching theory instead of practice and to fitting men for superintendence and the higher branches of industry. We have too many men trained for engineers of various kinds and for managers and foremen. Too many are trained to aspire to be officers, when the great need is for privates in the industrial army.

Public education is the cause of the masses. It is their only hope and their vital necessity. The wealthy classes can always be sure of such training as they desire for their young, but the man who toils for a day's wages must educate his boy and his girl at the public school if they are to be educated at all. The common man should make the public school his chief concern, for upon it depends the future of his own children and all similarly situated. As a citizen he should bend his every energy to see that the public school is properly equipped and maintained and that the course of instruction is practical, such as will fit the common people for the life that they are compelled to lead whether they will or not, a life of usefulness and self-support. And since the welfare of the masses, the producing class, is of chief importance, every patriot, every lover of his country, whether he belongs to the workers or not, should make the public school the object of his deepest solicitude. All men are indeed brothers and all must stand or fall together, but though the citizen fails to recognize this eternal truth he must still cherish public education if he would preserve the institutions of our country.

The vocational education that I contend for is that which fits the youth of the land to make its way in the world, that teaches horse sense and good judgment as applied to the business of earning a living. Such training should produce better mechanics, better-kept homes, better farmers, and more fruitful fields. By it the workingman will increase his output and must be secured in a larger wage and shorter hours of labor for a day's work. By it the yield of the farm will be enhanced so that the cost of living will be reduced, farm incomes multiplied and reflected in better farm dwellings, more of the comforts of life, rural life made more attractive, and the farming population increased.

In providing for vocational education we should carefully preserve the democracy of the public school. It is the Nation's real melting pot, where prejudices of caste and class are broken down and where young Americans learn to respect their fellow citizens of differing types, blood, and antecedents. It is the mightiest influence in our great young Nation to soothe the antagonisms of varying sects, parties, and associations. We must be careful to preserve this democracy. Those who expect to enter manual occupations must not be segregated from their fellow pupils, but must be kept in close touch with them, so as not to constitute a separate class. We must not make the mistake which has been made by some European countries where children designed for useful occupations are from the beginning separated from those who are seeking a mere liberal education.

The vocational education which I support is not that which would teach a mechanic a trade. It would not fit him to enter directly into a vocation or to avoid a reasonable period of apprenticeship. The training should be general and fundamental. It should be such as perhaps to shorten the apprenticeship, but it should not take the place of a period of practical instruction under the guidance of a skilled workman.

In dealing with education for industry we should keep in mind as our chief consideration the interest of labor rather than that of the industry itself. The matter should be handled from the standpoint of the workman instead of that of the employer. We should not interfere with the apprentice systems of the trade-unions, and in no respect should the labor organizations be antagonized. We must bear in mind that the trade-unionists comprise a majority of the highest class skilled workmen. No system of vocational education can hope to be successful except with the cooperation of organized labor. We should recognize that organized labor is the best judge of its own problems and of labor questions generally, and should be guided largely by its advice. Above all other things, we must be absolutely sure that any system of vocational instruction is not used to oppress labor or to destroy labor's organizations. It must not be possible to train pupils in vocational schools for use as strike breakers or for other direct effect upon labor disputes. No instrumentality of government should be permitted to intervene other than by mediation and advice in any ordinary labor dispute.

By the bill under consideration an aggregate of $38,400,000 is appropriated for vocational education for the next 10 years. This is a small sum compared with the over $650,000,000 appropriated for the current year alone for our Army and Navy. The appropriations proposed for next year for preparation for war aggregate about $800,000,000, so that in the 10 years in which we are spending $38,400,000 for education of the people for purposes of peace it is proposed to spend the vast and inconceivable sum of eight billions of dollars for war. Think of it, $38,400,000 for welfare and happiness, $8,000,000,000 for ruin and disaster. I would much rather reverse the expenditures, for with a productive people in a state of comfort and well-being, peace is assured, while for a nation burdened with tremendous taxes for militarism and saddled with a powerful and complex organization for fighting, war would seem inevitable.

I am for preparedness for peace, the only preparedness worth while, the preparedness which multiplies homes in the land and adorns and furnishes them, which promotes good morals and a higher spiritual life, which makes more useful and productive citizens, and gives to the world more food and more of the comforts of life. I am for preparedness for peace. It means pure religion, better physical life, and a better-founded love for liberty and for American institutions. It means the development of civilization and evolution into a higher and nobler existence for mankind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby annually appropriated, out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sums provided in sections 2, 3, and 4 of this act, to be paid to the respective States for the purpose of cooperating with the States in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects, and of teachers of trade and industrial subjects, and in the preparation of teachers of agricultural, trade, and industrial, and home economics subjects; and the sum provided for in section 7 to the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the administration of this act, and for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports to aid in the organization and conduct of vocational education, which sums shall be expended as hereinafter provided.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, did not we some days ago, by unanimous consent, get permission to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill?

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 2, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast in Thy providence brought us once more to the place of our reckoning of time. It is a place of holy memories and of divine inspiration. We turn our faces toward the coming days with high hopes and with confidence in the final supremacy of the great national ideals. The ship of state turns its way upon a stormy sea. A hundred million spirits depend upon the leadership of the men whom Thou hast called into places of authority and power. Give to them spiritual vision and hearts to see God, leading us on in the great conquests of peace. Grant, we pray, that this year we may achieve a nation's highest ideal and ambition in the establishment of peace and good will among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Senator WILLARD SAULSBURY) took the chair.

JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 22, 1916, was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. Much has been said recently about what has been called a "leak" from official sources with respect to certain important official acts, which "leak," it is said, affected the stock market in New York. I need not say more about that, for the reason that everyone within my hearing is familiar with the newspaper gabble about the subject referred to.

My attention has been called to an article appearing in the Ottumwa (Iowa) Daily Courier of December 21 of the year just ended. This article is apparently in the form of a dispatch from New York, and I would think from its printed appearance that it was sent out by some news agency, telling about the break in the stock market, the losses, and the profits of speculation. I read the closing paragraph of this dispatch, which is as follows:

> Total sales up to 1 o'clock December 21 approximated 2,000,000 shares, indicating that the full day's trading would probably exceed all records. Of this amount, United States Senator STONE alone contributed 574,900 shares.

I do not think I would dignify this statement by any notice whatever except for the fact that so much has been said and is being said about this affair. The article is headed "Market in a panic," and if this dispatch be true, inasmuch, according to this dispatch, I was either selling or buying about one-fourth of all the stock dealt in on that day of panic, I must have had a great deal to do with the panic.

I take it, Senators, that it is needless to say, and yet I feel I ought to say, not in my defense but as emphasizing an example of newspaper mendacity or news agency mendacity, that I did not buy or sell one penny's worth of stock of any kind. The story as to me is just simply an unvarnished falsehood.

I do not care to say more about that; what I have said is enough. And yet I crave permission to add that these wild, panicky stock speculation stories do concern me at least in two ways: First, if it be true that any public official has used any confidential or secret information, as has been alleged, to further his interests in speculation on the stock markets, he is an unspeakable scoundrel. If any man in legislative life did a thing like that, which I am bound to believe impossible; if any Senator did a thing like that, which still more I believe to be impossible, he ought to be dismissed from the body he dishonors.

Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any foundation for these sensational stories; I mean I know nothing of the facts in this particular instance—only I believe, for the most part, the charges are lies. I do know that some things have occurred in the State Department that ought not to have been possible. I do know that confidential communications made years ago by foreign Governments to the State Department, communications that would never have been made, which could not have been made, except in the faith that our State Department would hold them sacred, have by some means found their way into the hands of men not authorized to receive them. I am not the only Senator present who knows that; yet I think I might take this occasion to refer to it. The things to which I refer did not concern stock markets; they could not have affected stock values or speculations; but they did concern the honor of the Nation. This was treachery on the part of some departmental officials. Such things could have happened only through the infidelity of employees in the department. I fear that this betrayal of public confidence is in some way traceable to our wonderful civil service. Let me say, without a moment's halting, if I could have my way I would have every administration put its own trusted men—men of its own choosing—in every really responsible place. Do not understand me as saying that the civil service should be swept off the statute books; but there are men now holding important and confidential relations to the State Department, and no doubt in other departments, who have no reason, except as they individually may be honest men and true, to be faithful to their chiefs. Many of them, I am sure, would be happy to see the administration in which they serve a failure. I think those who hold positions of control and of dominating influence—the chiefs of divisions and up—should be in hearty sympathy with the administration under which they serve. Otherwise you have unfriendly captains on guard. That is all I care to say about that, but I think this an opportune occasion to impress the importance of this view.

The second view I have of this stock-market business is this, that I do not care the snap of my fingers about whether the stock gamblers in Wall Street lose or win. I am deeply concerned to know that no public official has betrayed a trust or profited by speculations. But, so far as the Lawson type is concerned, I do not care whether they win or lose; it is a gamble in which I feel no interest. I hope we have come to a period in our public life—our progressive public life—when the Government of the United States does not have to wait upon the stock exchange of New York or any exchange anywhere to determine when it shall communicate with foreign Governments or what it shall say to foreign Governments. I hope we have reached a time when the President can say what he pleases to foreign Governments, or say what he pleases to the Congress, without waiting with bated breath to find out whether his utterance may have some effect on Wall Street speculations. So far as I am concerned, these gamblers may take care of themselves and the Government take care of itself without regard to them, provided always, I say again, that no public official in any department of the Government is guilty of wrongdoing.

Mr. President, I had thought to say something about this Lawson talk. Is it worth while to speak of it? However, I will say this much, that all this Lawson talk disgusts me. It disgusts me that any man in public life would give a moment of serious thought or attention to such talk from such a source, unless he should know that it would lead to the exposure and disgrace of an undeserving public servant; but he should be sure of that. If there is anything that I despise, it is the sensational fakir who is always advertising himself by talking about public bodies and public men. If you were to believe this fellow Lawson, you would suppose there were no honest men in the Senate or in the House or in any position in public life. He makes bold to say that Senators and Representatives are ready to suppress something for fear that if an honest investigation were entered upon there would not be next day a quorum in either House. Think of that, Mr. President! that a creature of this low type, this abominable and contemptible human thing—another and perhaps worse type than the imprisoned Wolf of Wall Street—should make a statement of this character and have it considered by Members of Congress and exploited column after column in the newspapers of the country. It is shameful!

To say nothing of Congressmen, I am sorry that our great newspapers—I am not now speaking of the gentlemen of the press up there, for they have had little to do with it; nothing, so far as I know; but I speak of the papers they represent—I am sorry that great papers should give voice to the braying of this ass and exploit his libels against the Government through their columns. I despise the one; I am sorry about the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I know nothing about the article to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has referred. I accept, of course, implicitly the statement that he has made. Indeed, it would not have required any statement from him to have convinced me that the charge or suggestion made had no foundation.

I feel, however, that I ought to say this: The newspaper in which the article occurs is one of the most reputable publications of which I know. Its editor and its owners are high-minded, honorable men, and they would not intentionally publish a falsehood about any man. It is certain to me that they have been misled through some agency or correspondent. I say this in their behalf lest it should be thought that the article emanates from a cheap or sensational newspaper.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the Senator from Iowa the article to which he refers?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not.

Mr. BORAH. May I see the article to which the Senator from Missouri has referred?

Mr. STONE. I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I take it that this article is an Associated Press dispatch, and, in my judgment, all this is due to a mistake somewhere in transmission. Being an Associated Press dispatch it would have appeared in hundreds of newspapers if we are not to assume an error as to this paper. This undoubtedly refers to United States Steel instead of United States Senator STONE. [Laughter.] I think it would be found upon examination that it was not intended to use Senator STONE'S name at all, but that it was merely a mistake in the transmission of the telegram—either in the reading in the beginning or the reading when it was taken from the dispatch or in proof reading. If you will look up other similar dispatches, you will find it says United States Steel, and so forth.

FARM-LAND BANK AT DENVER, COLO.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to introduce a bill and want to say a word of explanation with relation to it. I wish to protest in the name of Colorado against the action of the Federal Farm Loan Board in leaving a stretch of territory extending 1,400 miles east and west without a farm-land bank being located therein. All the western banks have been located near the Missouri River within 250 to 400 miles of each other and on the Pacific coast, and there is a vast intermediate domain where no bank has been located. There are lands in my State that are more than 800 miles by the nearest line of travel from the farm-land bank established for that district.

I want to say on behalf of my State and the Rocky Mountain region that the State of Colorado has as many acres of irrigated land as has the entire country of Egypt, which supports a population of 9,000,000 people. We have problems there that can not as accurately be solved in the other portions of the United States. We have the semiarid problem that is entirely different from those of the Mississippi Valley.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we should have had a bank located somewhere in that part of the country, and that the Federal Farm Loan Board did not take into consideration the due interests of the great Rocky Mountain region in their finding as to where the banks should be located.

It is true that people used to think that Colorado was only a gold and silver State, but I want to say that we produce in agriculture four times as much in value as we do of gold and silver. This is a growing section, because every acre of land between the Rocky Mountains and the eastern border of our State, as well as of the large mesas and valleys of the mountain region, will be cultivated and will produce remunerative crops. It is this new growing section, where interest rates are high and money is essential to development, that a farm-land bank is most needed. In the older sections farms have already been improved and many farmers have money to lend.

I therefore ask leave to introduce the bill and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 7583) to amend the Federal farm-loan act by providing for the establishment of the thirteenth Federal farm-land bank district, to be composed of the States of Colorado,

Wyoming, Utah, and New Mexico, and to establish a Federal land bank therein at Denver, Colo., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide capital for agricultural development; to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgage; to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans; to furnish a market for United States bonds; to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States; and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1916, be amended by adding at the end of the second paragraph of section 4 thereof the following:

"There is hereby established a Federal land-bank district, to be designated as district No. 13, to be composed of the States of Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, and New Mexico, and there shall be established by the Federal Farm Loan Board a Federal land bank for said district at Denver, Colo. The above-named States shall be withdrawn from the districts in which they have been included from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment only to announce and emphasize my sympathy with the attitude of my colleague with regard to the subject of the bill which he has just introduced. The great Rocky Mountain region, as he has well said, is no longer, strictly speaking, the mineral section of the United States exclusively, by which I mean it is neither dependent upon nor is population attracted to it as formerly by its wonderful mineral resources. It is a great agricultural country, and is becoming more so with the passing of every year. With regard to the irrigated portions of the country it occupies a position peculiar to itself, and, as a consequence, it would seem to be only natural that such a situation should appeal very strongly to the selecting power in determining where its Federal farm-loan banks should be located. It is a remarkable fact, one for which I can assign no intelligent reason, that in the distribution of these banks this region seems to have been entirely ignored or forgotten.

What is more remarkable, the place selected for the Federal farm-loan bank in the district of which Colorado forms a part is geographically out of touch with the greater part of the district. It is not even upon a main line of east and west travel. The roads which traverse it do not, generally speaking, run north and south. They supply a section of the United States which forms another district, excepting, of course, the State of Oklahoma. In order to reach it from New Mexico and from Colorado it is necessary to make at least one change of cars, and because of its geographical situation its selection might as well, for all practical purposes, have not been made at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just one moment. If this bank had been located at Topeka, or, if you please, in Kansas City, Kans., it would have been easily accessible to the entire district and would have been much more favorable and much more convenient, therefore, to our people. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado if there is any farm-loan bank site or location agreed upon which is to be found in any of that arid region where irrigation projects are going on?

Mr. THOMAS. With the exception of Spokane, I know of none. But the Senator is more familiar with that region of the country than am I.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose it was for the reason that the farm-loan act would not perhaps be applicable to that region where irrigation projects are located because of the defect of titles as yet; that there would, therefore, be no opportunity for the farmers to avail themselves of it.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho will agree that a large proportion of the lands in the region of country which he and I in part represent are lands that are obtained from the Government of the United States and are cultivated as such, and that the title is or ought to be quite as good as other titles emanating from the United States to its citizens.

Mr. BORAH. But the farmers who most need the benefits of this act are those who are now acquiring titles; that is, those who are just acquiring their lands and their homes. As I understand, by reason of the fact that there is this lien of the Government upon all these lands, the act could not be made available.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, that, Mr. President, may result from the actual operation of the law, but I do not think so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If my colleague will allow me, I desire to state to the Senator from Idaho that the amount of land under Federal reclamation projects is insignificant compared with the total number of acres that are being brought under reclamation by private enterprise. Consequently, as to all those lands which are being improved under private enterprise, there can be no question but that the act can apply.

I wish also to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I supposed the act was intended to aid and assist those who are trying to build up homes, who are pioneers, while, as a matter of fact, the people in the older settled communities do not need assistance so much as it is needed by those in the new communities.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in my judgment the defect of the law, if I may say so, is that it can not be made applicable to or does not reach those who are pioneers and who are building up their homes, and so forth, unless they have actually completed their title. There is a vast number of people in that region who need it most whom it does not reach at all, and, in my judgment, whom it can not reach. I hope I am in error, but I fear it will not reach those who have a lien on their lands for water rights. If so, it is a serious defect and ought to be remedied.

Mr. THOMAS. Just another word. If the States of Colorado and New Mexico were not in the arid region, if the district for which Wichita has been selected as the point for the Federal loan bank were a purely agricultural one, with lands and titles and climate similar to those in Kansas and Nebraska and Missouri and Iowa, I would still protest against the action of the board in selecting a place for the bank, which is designed to contribute to the well-being of the entire section of the country, where it is geographically inconvenient of access and not centrally and fairly located. That is the main point of my complaint.

As I said before, if the location, however insignificant it might be as a community, were upon the main lines of east and west travel, so that it were readily and easily accessible, so that it were convenient to the mutual demands of the entire district, while I should still feel that the city where I live has not been fairly treated in this matter, I would voice no complaint, but accept the result with the best possible grace. Of course I am aware that the action of the board is final, unless it can be induced to reverse itself, and that, however inconvenient or inappropriate the place which has been selected may be, it will be difficult, indeed, to change it, except in the manner which is proposed by the bill which my colleague has just introduced. As a matter of fairness, as a matter of justice, however, to the great arid region of the Rocky Mountain West, either one of these banks should be located in some central position there, or the measure which my colleague has introduced should be incorporated into the law.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. STONE. I submit an amendment authorizing the President to extend to the Governments of Central and South America an invitation to be represented by their ministers of finance and leading bankers, not exceeding three in number in each case, to attend the second session of the Pan American Financial Conference in the city of Washington at such date as shall be determined by the President, and so forth, which I intend to propose to the Diplomatic and Consular bill (H. R. 19300). I ask that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, and that the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which accompanies the amendment, be referred to the committee to be considered in connection with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment providing that hereafter each of the district judges of the United States shall receive a salary of $9,000 a year, to be paid in monthly installments, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 18542), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the deputy clerk of the police court, District of Columbia, from $1,600 to $1,800, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19119), which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment relative to the transfer of documents, maps, plats, or other papers belonging to the executive departments, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing that the appropriation for surveys and resurveys of public land for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, as provided for in the sundry civil appropriation act of that year, be made immediately available for the services in the General Land Office of a sufficient number of competent surveyors, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 18542), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—RICHARD HUDSON.

On motion of Mr. SMOOT, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 84, Sixty-fourth Congress, granting an increase of pension to Richard Hudson, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ANNUAL COST OF FEDERAL PRISONS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which I send to the desk and desire to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 301) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a statement of the annual cost of the office of superintendent of prisons, his assistants, prison examiners, and clerks, together with the annual cost of the position of pardon clerk and the force in his office; also all expenses incurred as an incident to holding meetings of the parole board; also names and pay of each person connected with the offices of superintendent of prisons and pardon clerk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Georgia kindly explain the object of the resolution and why it should be agreed to?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall be glad to do so. The American Prison Association has passed resolutions criticizing our prison-parole system and advising a different system. There are those who are studying the question, and in connection with their study they desire the present cost of the existing system. To obtain that information is the only object of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ELLA M. JONES.

Mr. KERN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 302), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Ella M. Jones, widow of Frank G. Jones, late a private of the police force of the Senate Office Building, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

EXECUTIVE-SESSION PROCEEDINGS (S. DOC. NO. 652).

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a notice of a motion which I shall make to-morrow, looking to a proposed amendment of the standing rules of the Senate relative to proceedings in the executive sessions of the Senate. Ordinarily I would ask that the notice be read, but it is somewhat lengthy, and I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, and also be printed in the usual form so that Senators can familiarize themselves with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The notice and proposed amendment of the rules are as follows:

Senate resolution 306.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1917.

To the Senate:

Notice is hereby given that on the next legislative day I will move to amend certain of the standing rules of the Senate. A copy of the motion is hereto attached and made a part hereof.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

I move to amend the standing rules of the Senate as follows, to wit:

Amend Rule XXXV so that it will read as follows:

"On a motion to close the doors of the Senate on the discussion on any legislative business, no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes and a two-thirds vote shall be required for its adoption."

Amend paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVI so that it will read as follows, to wit:

"Executive business, including nominations and treaties, shall be considered in open executive session: Provided, however, That after the Senate upon motion made and adopted passes into executive session it shall be in order to move that any particular item of such business shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and upon the motion no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes. If the motion is adopted by a two-thirds vote, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Principal Legislative Clerk, the Executive Clerk, the Minute and Journal Clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary, and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy: Provided further, That treaties and confidential communications laid before the Senate by the President shall not be made public until the Senate enters upon their consideration, and not then if it is ordered as hereinbefore provided that they shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings in secret session shall be kept secret until the Senate by resolution takes off the injunction of secrecy."

Strike out paragraph 3 of Rule XXXVI.

Change present paragraph 4, making it 3, and also amend it by striking out in the second line thereof the words "or confidential."

Strike out paragraph 5.

Amend Rule XXXVII as follows, to wit:

By striking from the fourth and fifth lines the words "to remove the injunction of secrecy, or to consider it in open executive session."

Also, by striking out the ninth line on page 34 and substituting therefor the words "if it has been or is being considered in secret session."

Insert after the word "indefinitely," in line 20, page 34, the words "and a motion to consider it in secret session."

Also, by striking out paragraph 3.

Amend Rule XXXVIII by striking out paragraph 2 thereof.

If these amendments are made, Rules XXXV, XXXVI, XXXVII, and XXXVIII will read as follows, to wit:

"RULE XXXV.

"On a motion to close the doors of the Senate on the discussion of any legislative business, no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes, and a two-thirds vote shall be required for its adoption.

"RULE XXXVI.

"EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

"1. When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber for the consideration of executive business, he shall have a seat on the right of the Presiding Officer. When the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Senators shall attend at the place appointed, with the necessary officers of the Senate.

"2. Executive business, including nominations and treaties, shall be considered in open executive session: Provided, however, That after the Senate upon motion made and adopted passes into executive session, it shall be in order to move that any particular item of such business shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and upon the motion no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes. If the motion is adopted by a two-thirds vote, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Minute and Journal Clerks, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy. Provided further, That treaties and confidential communications laid before the Senate by the President shall not be made public until the Senate enters upon their consideration, and not then if it is ordered as hereinbefore provided that they shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings in secret session shall be kept secret until the Senate by resolution takes off the injunction of secrecy.

"3. Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate and to punishment for contempt.

"RULE XXXVII.

"EXECUTIVE SESSION—PROCEEDINGS ON TREATIES.

"1. When a treaty shall be laid before the Senate for ratification it shall be read a first time, and no motion in respect to it shall be in order, except to refer it to a committee, to print it in confidence for the use of the Senate.

"When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration, after which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, 'Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?' And the amendments may be taken separately or in gross, if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed. At any stage of such proceedings the Senate may remove the injunction of secrecy from the treaty, if it has been or is being considered in secret session.

"The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be, which shall be proposed on a subsequent day, unless by unanimous consent the Senate determine otherwise, at which stage no amendment shall be received unless by unanimous consent.

"On the final question to advise and consent to the ratification in the form agreed to, the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators shall be necessary to determine it in the affirmative; but all other motions and questions upon a treaty shall be decided by a majority vote, except a motion to postpone indefinitely and a motion to consider it in secret session, which shall be decided by a vote of two-thirds.

"2. Treaties transmitted by the President to the Senate for ratification shall be resumed on the second or any subsequent session of the same Congress at the stage in which they were left at the final adjournment of the session at which they were transmitted; but all proceedings on treaties shall terminate with the Congress, and they shall be resumed at the commencement of the next Congress as if no proceedings had previously been had thereon.

"RULE XXXVIII.

"EXECUTIVE SESSION—PROCEEDINGS ON NOMINATIONS.

"1. When nominations shall be made by the President of the United States to the Senate, they shall, unless otherwise ordered, be referred to appropriate committees; and the final question on every nomination shall be, 'Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?'

which question shall not be put on the same day on which the nomination is received nor on the day on which it may be reported by a committee, unless by unanimous consent.

"2. When a nomination is confirmed or rejected, any Senator voting in the majority may move for a reconsideration on the same day on which the vote was taken or on either of the next two days of actual executive session of the Senate; but if a notification of the confirmation or rejection of a nomination shall have been sent to the President before the expiration of the time within which a motion to reconsider may be made, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the President to return such notification to the Senate. Any motion to reconsider the vote on a nomination may be laid on the table without prejudice to the nomination, and shall be a final disposition of such motion.

"3. Nominations confirmed or rejected by the Senate shall not be returned by the Secretary to the President until the expiration of the time limited for making a motion to reconsider the same, or while a motion to reconsider is pending, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

"4. When the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess for more than 30 days, all motions to reconsider a vote upon a nomination which has been confirmed or rejected by the Senate which shall be pending at the time of taking such adjournment or recess shall fall, and the Secretary shall return all such nominations to the President as confirmed or rejected by the Senate, as the case may be.

"5. Nominations neither confirmed nor rejected during the session at which they are made shall not be acted upon at any succeeding session without being again made to the Senate by the President; and if the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess for more than 30 days all nominations pending and not finally acted upon at the time of taking such adjournment or recess shall be returned by the Secretary to the President and shall not again be considered unless they shall again be made to the Senate by the President."

COMPULSORY-ARBITRATION LAW OF NORWAY (S. DOC. NO. 650).

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have here a translation of the compulsory-arbitration law of Norway, which was approved last June. I ask to have it printed as a Senate document. The cost will not exceed $15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ABSENTEE VOTING.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have in my hand a paper prepared at my request by the legislative reference division of the Library of Congress on the matter of absentee voting—something that at the present time is interesting the people in more than one State where the legislatures are in session. I ask that the paper be referred to the Committee on Printing, and I will venture to suggest to the committee that I trust they will consider it at as early a day as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

REPUBLIC OF CUBA V. STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 300) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Republic of Cuba moved in the Supreme Court of the United States to be permitted to institute an action of debt against the State of North Carolina upon certain bonds purporting to be issued by the said State of North Carolina in the years 1868 and 1869, which said bonds are particularly described in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba filed with its motion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the United States is directed to use his offices with the Republic of Cuba to ascertain when and under what circumstances the Republic of Cuba acquired these bonds, and from whom it acquired them, and for what purpose it holds them, and what price, if any, it paid for said bonds; and if the Republic of Cuba has moved to institute suit against the State of North Carolina in behalf of itself, or in behalf of others who may own said bonds; and to communicate said information to the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that is a somewhat remarkable resolution to be adopted by the Senate. Perhaps I did not catch the reading of it very clearly; but as I understand it the Republic of Cuba has filed an application in the Supreme Court of the United States to be permitted to bring an action against the State of North Carolina. Therefore a judicial question is presented to the Supreme Court. It seems to me rather a remarkable thing when an action of that sort has been instituted for the Senate or for any department of the Government to take steps to compel a party litigant to disclose his case to the Senate. I never have heard of such a thing being undertaken before.

Mr. OVERMAN. All the State of North Carolina wants is information. I want to say, Mr. President, that the holders of these bonds have attempted to donate them to many of the States. For example, the great State of New York, when they were tendered to it, turned the offer down with contempt. When they were tendered to the great State of Rhode Island they were accepted by reason of an act of the legislature. The legislature passed an act authorizing the governor to accept them and to bring suit, and after the governor had inquired into the matter he called an extra session of the legislature, and in one of the most patriotic messages I have ever read, showing him to be a wise and patriotic man, urged the legislature to repeal the law, which they did unanimously. The holders of the bonds attempted to donate them to the great State of Michigan and Michigan turned down the offer with contempt, because, as they said—and other great States, to wit, the great State of Missouri—these bondholders were trying to use a sister State in order to coerce the State of North Carolina to make good bonds that had been repudiated, issued during the reconstruction days. That has been done many times.

All the State wants to know is the bona fides of this transaction. I think it is due to Cuba herself that these facts should be brought to her knowledge. I am satisfied that Cuba would like to know what was the ultimate object of these bondholders in the donation of these bonds or whether or not it is a scheme of the bondholders to use a sister Republic to aid them. All we ask is information as to how they were acquired, and whether Cuba owns them. I do not know that Cuba owns them. Is there any objection to North Carolina having information as to whether Cuba owns these bonds and how she acquired them? If it turns out that they were not donated to Cuba, and Cuba was not the bona fide holder, the Supreme Court would not take jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. What obstacle, if any, is there to prevent the State of North Carolina in its official capacity from making this request of the Secretary of State? In other words, why is it essential that action of this kind be taken by the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know that the State of North Carolina would have a right to ask the Secretary of State for any information. The request would properly come from the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. My impression is, with all due deference to my friend the Senator from North Carolina, not only that the request of the State would receive due consideration, but that it has a perfect right to go to the Secretary of State for this identical information in view of the facts which are recited by the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is also an international question which might come in here, as the Senator will find out.

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the case I think this should be a matter for congressional action, if we are to take any action at all, rather than a mere resolution of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, all we want is this information.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not opposing the Senator's resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand.

Mr. THOMAS. But it seems to me that it is an unnecessary thing for the Senate to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, why should not the Secretary of State use his good offices with a sister Republic to get this information for a great State of this Union? The question is whether or not they can sue on these bonds. That question is pending in the Supreme Court now; but if we get information which satisfies Cuba that the object of these people is to establish certain bonds that the States have repudiated, I am satisfied that Cuba itself would withdraw this case. Here is a sister State, one of the great States of this Union asking simply for some information. That is all it is. I do not see why the Senator should object to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am only interested in preserving the distinction which exists between the different departments of this Government. It seems to me that this is a matter with which the Senate of the United States has nothing to do; that it would be a mere intrusion on the part of the Senate to pass a resolution of this character.

The resolution recites that a proceeding has been brought in the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, either that proceeding is well founded or it is ill founded. If it is well founded, the Supreme Court of the United States will hold so. We have not anything to do with it. We can not interfere with it. It is a judicial question. If it is ill founded, then the Supreme Court will discover it, and the proceeding will be dismissed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, that is so, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the proceeding is brought by the Republic of Cuba, and evidently brought upon the theory that a cause of action exists; and I can not see upon what thory the legislative department of the Government can interfere in the matter at all. In other words, it is not any of our business.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, does the Senator say it is none of the business of the Senate to aid a great State in getting certain information—in aid of doing justice? Not only is North Carolina involved, but there may be 14 or 15 other States concerned in this very question. Let me read from the bill for just one second, and the Senator will see what I mean:

The authority of the attorney for the Republic of Cuba to bring this suit was conferred by a decree of the Government of that country, which is ready to be exhibited to the court if desired.

Now, there is something concealed. They do not furnish the court even with the decree. All we want is information. The Senator can see himself that they simply make that broad statement—"the decree will be shown if desired."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the Senator go to the tribunal that has jurisdiction over the question and get that information.

Mr. OVERMAN. I could not go before the Supreme Court and ask the Supreme Court to inquire of the Government of Cuba for certain information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The State of North Carolina can.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I do not think so. I do not think the lawyers could ask the Supreme Court of the United States in their suit for certain information as to the bona fides of this gift. We know in this country—we must take notice of the fact—that in the case of South Dakota——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. CLARK. Has the Senator considered any other means by which this information might be obtained?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know of any other means.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator think that application to the State Department, without this resolution of the Senate, would bring the same information that this resolution would bring?

Mr. OVERMAN. I candidly say to the Senator that I believe if I were to write a letter to the Secretary of State asking him to furnish the information, the Secretary of State would do it; but I think it would come with more grace from the Senate to ask for this information, to show Cuba that not only one of the great States of this Union is interested in this matter, but it interests the whole country.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, if the Senator's purpose is to rebuke the friendly Republic of Cuba, that is correct; but if he wants the information, as he says, undoubtedly he can get it without taking this legislative action.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no rebuke in it or intended. All the resolution asks is that the Secretary of State shall use his good offices to get information. All we want is information.

Mr. CLARK. Then why not get it from the Secretary without this resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he has any information as to whether the motion made in behalf of the Republic of Cuba for permission to file a suit itself discloses anything about the ownership of the bonds? Does it allege that Cuba owns the bonds?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, it is so mixed up in doubt that I can not tell whether it does or not. It says:

The authority of the attorney for the Republic of Cuba to bring this suit was conferred by a decree of the Government of that country, which is ready to be exhibited to the court, if desired.

They do not exhibit the decree in their bill at all.

Mr. CLARK. That is just the authority to bring the suit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know very little about this matter, although I have heard incidentally that there was such a proceeding about to be instituted and that it did not clearly develop whether the bonds were owned by the Republic of Cuba or had been acquired by a subordinate department of the Republic, and whether they were actually owned by the department or whether simply an arrangement had been made with the attorney who represents the owner.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is just what I want to get at. This petition does not disclose that fact, and while I do not know about it personally, my information is that the Republic of Cuba really does not own them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. The application is not printed, but the memorandum in support of the application for leave to institute suit begins as follows:

This is an application on behalf of the Republic of Cuba for leave to bring an action at law in this court against the State of North Carolina upon a number of bonds of that State, payable to bearer, and now the property of the Republic of Cuba.

This is simply the memorandum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume, of course, that in any suit, if permission is granted, the Republic of Cuba, or whoever the plaintiff may be, will have to prove its interest and prove its bona fides. As I understand, these are old bonds that the State has never recognized, and several transactions have been had with bonds issued under similar circumstances. The bonds are frequently passed around from one hand to another and sold at very small prices.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me interrupt him there, I want to say that these bonds, some $13,000,000 of them, were issued for the purpose of building railroads. There was not a crosstie laid nor an iron laid, and the bonds were hawked around on the market at 5 cents on the dollar. The State never received any return from them. The bonds are fraudulent, and because they were issued by fraud the State repudiated them. I am not going into the merits of the case, but most of the States have turned down these bonds, as I say. I have heard just what the Senator says, that the Cuban Republic does not own these bonds; but they have used that country by some sort of legislation to get before this court. Now, unless Cuba owns them, of course the Supreme Court could not have jurisdiction; and if we knew that fact that would be the end of the case. I think Cuba itself, our sister Republic, would be very glad for us to take this action and let us get this information. It is simply information that we want. There is no reflection involved on anybody.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why can not the State of North Carolina, which is a party to this proceeding, apply in the Supreme Court itself for a bill of particulars? Is there any reason why it can not do that?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is a question about which the Senator knows better than I do. I do not know; I have never looked into that question; but this is such a simple way to deal with the matter that I can not see why the Senator should object to it. Why not let the Secretary confer——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says he can not see why I should object. I object upon exactly the same theory that I should object if a resolution were presented by the Senator asking to have information obtained by the Secretary of the Interior in some action that had been brought in which public lands were involved. My objection is that it is not any of our business; that it is the business of the court where the action is pending. I will say further, if the Senator will permit me, that I know something about these bond transactions, and I sympathize with the Senator's point of view.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator does.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that the State of North Carolina ought not to be compelled to pay these bonds, if I understand the facts, but it is the business of the court where the action is pending to determine, and it is not our business to determine, the question. It is not our business to aid either of the litigants to develop its case.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not for the purpose of developing the case; it is where a great State, a part of this great Union, says, through its Senators, the State would like to have certain information, and the Senate should aid in getting the information. We would like to have the Secretary of State get the information for us. I do not know whether the court would do that, and the Senator does not know.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator another question: If this is a proper way to proceed—that is, to invoke the aid of the State Department—why does not the State of North Carolina ask the intervention of the State Department, or why does not the Senator himself ask it? Why is it necessary to make the Senate of the United States an errand boy between the State of North Carolina and the State Department?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not an errand boy. I can do it, and I will do it if the Senate should turn me down. I would be glad to do it, and I believe the Secretary will comply with my request, but I want them to know that the Senate of the United States is behind the great State of North Carolina in asking Cuba to furnish information to a sister State. I can not understand why the resolution should not be passed. I can ask for the information; I will ask for it, but I would rather have this great body stand behind the State Department and say we would be very glad if you would give us this information.

There is a great deal involved in this question, Mr. President. Suppose that this is carried to its ultimate limits, every State in the South would be involved, because hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars were issued during those carpetbag days, from which the States reaped no benefit. Then, if the bondholders could get a judgment against any of these 11 States by a scheme to use foreign countries for their nefarious purpose it would be finally taken to The Hague, and the question would have to be settled there, and international trouble would be the result. So, in the last analysis, there is an international question involved. If we can show that they are doing in Cuba what they have tried to do in a dozen or more of the great States of the Union, knowing the facts incidentally, they would spurn the attempt at coercion with contempt. So it does seem to me that the Senator should agree to let the resolution pass.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to make this suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina. I believe he is right in saying this is a matter for diplomacy, or at least concurrently with the court, but it seems to me that he does not put the resolution on the right ground. He asks our State Department to secure from the Republic of Cuba certain information. Why does he not ask our Secretary of State to take up with the Republic of Cuba an inquiry as to the propriety of a foreign country coming into the United States and seeking to sue one of the States? I do not know of any provision in the Constitution that gives a foreign country the right to sue a State in the Supreme Court of the United States or in any other tribunal. I think it would be distinctly an affront to our country to make any such proposition. Suppose Germany were now to come to the United States and ask for leave to sue a State or to sue the United States in the Supreme Court of the United States on account of our violation of the law of neutrality, it would be distinctly a matter for settlement between the State Department and the Empire of Germany. Just so here; unless one can point out some distinction for a suit instituted by a foreign country against a State in the Supreme Court of the United States, I think that the Senator from North Carolina ought to broaden his resolution and ask the State Department to take up with the Republic of Cuba the propriety of making any such application.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator states it much better than I could possibly state it. I think he is right, and I think the Senator's statement, patriotically and broadly made, would be covered in the resolution. In other words, the Secretary of State will consider all the questions suggested as well as get this information.

It is a great matter of international concern that is involved. The Constitution, in Article III, section 2, states that in certain matters foreign Governments can sue a State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I call the Senator's attention to the language of the Constitution? Article III, section 2, provides that—

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and—

To this I call special attention—

> And between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

Then, further along, the provision is:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction.

So the Constitution recognizes that there may be a case where a foreign State may sue one of the States of the Union, of which case the Supreme Court of the United States has original jurisdiction.

All I am insisting upon is that here is a case which upon its face appears to be properly brought, and the Senator is invoking the aid of the legislative branch of the Government to find out what evidence one of the party litigants has against the other. I insist that the remedy which the State of North Carolina has in that respect is to go into the tribunal which has jurisdiction of the subject matter and there make application for a bill of particulars if the petition which has been filed is not sufficient.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose it be true——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment further. I am not going to object to the consideration of the resolution. I think it has no place here. With all due respect to the Senator—I hope the Senator will not misunderstand me——

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it is a ridiculous thing for the Senate of the United States to pass such a resolution, but that is all I desire to say about it. I reserve the right to vote against it, but I make no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. As far as the bill of particulars is concerned, in a bill of particulars we would not possibly get the information we desire because it is left to the parties to state the particulars. We want this great Government to use its good offices in getting the information which we would not get in a bill of particulars, to use its good offices as the Senator has stated in reference to this sister Republic, for which we have spent millions, made war for, and given the people their liberty.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina as to a question of fact. Are the securities which are the basis of this suit held ostensibly by the Government of Cuba or by citizens of Cuba?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is just what I want to find out. The Senator from Utah read from the Constitution. If the Republic owns them and they are the property of the Republic, the court might have jurisdiction, though I deny that the Supreme Court has jurisdiction, no matter what the facts are. I understand that is not the case; I do not know that it is; they say here they are owned by the Republic. That is just the information I want. If this Government could use its good offices with Cuba, it would ask, "Cuba, do you own these bonds? If so, let us know just how you own them and why this suit is brought on bonds which have been absolutely repudiated by the State itself to make good bonds which a great sovereign State has by constitutional amendment repudiated?"

I hope no one will object to the resolution. All we want is the information. I am glad the Senator from Iowa made the statement he did, because it will go to the Secretary of State and the State Department will use its good offices accordingly. That has broadened the resolution, after what the Senator from Iowa has said about the resolution, and this would give them the authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am not going to object, but I want to enter my protest about making the Senate of the United States a party litigant in this proceeding, which, if properly brought and authority exists under the Constitution for bringing it, is cognizable by only one tribunal. The parties litigant are the State of North Carolina and the Republic of Cuba. The resolution simply makes the Senate of the United States one of the parties litigant. That is all it does. If the real information is all that is desired, as the Senator himself says, undoubtedly it could be obtained without objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say I think we could use our good offices to do it.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me, as indicated in the remarks of the Senator from Utah, that we are meddling with something in which we have no present affair. It is a case solely for the consideration of the Supreme Court of the United States, which has original jurisdiction in such matters. If it has original jurisdiction and originally takes jurisdiction of the case, it should be unhampered by any outside parties by interfering either with the procedure or the facts of the case. If it has jurisdiction, the case should be presented as all other cases should be presented, and its ultimate result will depend upon the evidence which either party will produce.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not see the point. It may have original jurisdiction under certain conditions. It has not under other conditions.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose the Supreme Court is able to determine whether it has jurisdiction or not, and no action by the Senate can take from or add to whatever jurisdiction the Supremen Court may have. The question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is not a question for the Senate to determine.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK. It is a question for that tribunal itself to determine. Therefore inasmuch as the Republic of Cuba, believing evidently that it has the right to make this application to the Supreme Court, makes it, it does seem to me, as the Senator from Utah says, that we are meddling with something we ought not to meddle with.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina knows how kindly disposed I am toward him and how loath I would be to interrupt anything that appeals to him as this matter evidently does, but I am going to venture to ask the Senator if he does not think in view of the differences of opinion on the part of eminent lawyers in this body the resolution might well go over one day for consideration?

Mr. OVERMAN. This matter is very important, and I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will come up to-morrow automatically if it goes over one day. Does not the Senator think it might be well to take that course?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to have it go over if the Senator desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, the resolution will go over for a day.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on December 27, 1916, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 7095. An act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved the 24th day of August, 1912; and

S. 6116. An act providing for the taxation of the lands of the Winnebago Indians and the Omaha Indians in the State of Nebraska.

PEACE OVERTURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 298) submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK December 22, 1916, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it has been my desire, and still is my desire, to have the resolution considered to-day and acted on by the Senate. I am, however, particularly anxious that when considered and acted on it may be a nonpartisan way and, if possible, by a unanimous Senate. It has been suggested to me by Senators on both sides of the Chamber that, in the interest of that result, it might be better by unanimous consent to have the resolution go over until to-morrow, still holding its privileged position. Personally I am willing to have that action taken if any Senator desires further time or if Senators desire an opportunity for consultation and further consideration; otherwise I should like to have the resolution considered to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the resolution was presented a few days ago I asked that it might go over. I did not make that request in a spirit of hostility to the resolution, but for the purpose of examining it with some care. I find that on a previous occasion the Senator from Nebraska offered a somewhat similar resolution, which went to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I will venture to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that it would be better, in my judgment, that this resolution should go to that committee and that the committee should take it up. The Senator is a member of the committee, and I have no doubt he would get speedy action. If it is desirable that the Senate shall commit itself on this very grave question, it will be largely guided by the judgment of that great committee; and I will ask the Senator if he does not think that that would be a better procedure?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, in answer to that question, I will state I had considered that course, but I prefer this method for two reasons: First, it is more expeditious, and, in the second place, the moral effect of this resolution will, in my opinion, be better if the Senate, now that it is before it, should act upon it. The Senate is a coordinate authority with the President on international matters, at least on many international matters; it is in fact the only legislative body in the world with functions and powers relating to international matters. The parliaments of the old countries and the legislative bodies of other nations practically, in so far as the great nations at least are concerned, have no such functions and powers; but the Senate possesses them, and it has a reputation, it has a standing in the world similar, if not equal, to that of the President.

Now, it seems to me that the Senate has a duty to perform independently of the President. The President has performed his duty. The world is confronted with the greatest disaster in its history. Men are being killed at the rate of 3,000 a day; the wealth of the world is being used up to the extent of $105,000,000 a day; and millions of men are being crippled each year. In the face of this tremendous calamity, now that the President has taken a step with the object and purpose of showing that the United States as a great neutral desires that the belligerent nations state what the possible terms of peace might be, it seems to me that it is timely that the Senate should act, and act at once.

Mr. President, there is no complication involved in this issue. I have been careful in my resolution so to limit its import and language as not to involve the Senate in an indorsement of the President's foreign policy, not even to involve the Senate in an indorsement of the argumentative parts of the President's letter, but to confine the indorsement entirely to an approval of the President's act in asking the nations at war to state terms of peace. I can not think there is any doubt in the mind of the country or in the mind of Senators here, without regard to party, that it will be the first step toward the end of the war if terms of peace can be stated. The nations may be far apart; we suppose they are; but some day, at some time, they must state what the possible terms of peace may be, and the sooner that step is taken the better. The importance, to my mind, of having the Senate, as the coordinate authority with the President, go on record in expressing the American desire that the terms of peace be stated lies in the fact that in all these countries there is a growing sentiment in favor of action looking to peace. That sentiment will be given great impulse if the Senate can add its plea to the plea already made by the President, and the end of the war may be in sight.

To my mind, Mr. President, it is of such importance and the issue is so simple that it ought not to be necessary to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I hope that it may be considered in a nonpartisan way, and I know that there are men on the other side of the Chamber who long as much as I do, and as any Senator could, to have a stop put to this awful horror. I am not speaking of our material interests; they are great; but we, as a neutral, have a right to ask this thing, not only a right given us by international law but specifically given to us in the terms of The Hague Convention.

So it seemed to me that the Senate ought to act on the resolution. I had not expected to say much on the subject, but I have felt that, if the question once arose here in the Senate, it probably could be settled in a nonpartisan way, and possibly even by a unanimous Senate. I know that the Senator from New Hampshire sympathizes with the general object in view, and I only suggested, if it were so desired, that this matter go over until to-morrow in the interest of greater harmony. If there is anything in the language of the resolution that should be amended, I should be glad to consider any such change.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to no man either in public or in private life in my desire to have the horrible condition in Europe terminated. I certainly would not under any circumstances, by voice or by vote, halt any movement that I believed would accomplish, or tend to accomplish, that result; but in reference to this resolution, Mr. President, I have received a large number of letters from men, whose judgment I deeply appreciate and whose wisdom I highly respect, saying that this resolution is not in good form, and that it will not tend to accomplish what the Senator from Nebraska has in view.

I have also read in influential journals, Mr. President, the very grave suggestion as to what our action may result in if we forget Washington's advice and enter into entangling alliances with foreign policies and foreign nations. I am not sufficiently well versed in constitutional law to know whether the objections which have been made are well grounded; but from one very influential source we are warned that we may endanger the supremacy of the Monroe doctrine if we interfere in these quarrels in any way with the nations of Europe. I do not know how that may be, but I should like a little time to look into it.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska does not feel like having the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I shall not make a motion looking to that end—I hope it will go over until to-morrow, and I trust that we may have time to calmly and dispassionately debate this question. So far as I am concerned, I shall take very few minutes in what I may have to say, and perhaps may not take any time at all; but there are great lawyers here on both sides of the Chamber who have looked into these matters of international concern very deeply, and whose opinions, if they care to express them, I would very much desire to avail myself of and to have the benefit of the conclusions that they may reach. So I say, Mr. President, if the Senator feels that the resolution ought not to go to the committee—though I think that would be the wise action to take—I trust it will go over without objection, and in due form come up to-morrow for consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think this resolution ought to go to the Foreign Relations Committee, where similar resolutions have already been sent. I think it ought to have the consideration of the committee.

This seems to me a very grave, a very large, and a very important subject. It is not one that can be whipped through in the morning hour as if it were an agreement to adjourn the Houses. It is of a most serious character. It deserves the examination of the Foreign Relations Committee and their advice to the Senate. There will be ample discussion of it, I am sure. I do not mean to say that there is the slightest desire to delay action upon it. The subject is altogether too important, in the opinion of some of us, certainly, to allow it to pass without discussion. I should like to say something in regard to it myself, and there are others who feel the same way. It will have to meet with thorough discussion before it leaves the Senate; also, there will have to be opportunity possibly to amend it if it is to pass.

I think, moreover, that we ought to have the necessary official papers before us. We have nothing now except the President's note that has come to us in an official form. I know that the fashion has been adopted lately of communicating with the Senate through the newspapers; but it seems to me that in this case there are a number of very important statements and notes that we ought to have in official form. It is not just to the Senate, it is not just to the department or to the administration, not to have them in proper form.

We have, as I have said, the President's note. There was a very important statement made by the Secretary of State after that note of the President had been published, in which he said that one reason for the note being sent was that we were on the verge of war. In the afternoon of the same day there was published another statement by the Secretary of State modifying the first statement; and on Sunday, the 24th of December, there was a third statement from the State Department in regard to the note. These were all official. We ought to have them in proper form. It is not just to the Secretary of State to discuss here what appeared in the newspapers. It may be accurate; it may not be.

We ought to have the German note of reply in full and in official form. The substance of it, it is stated in the newspapers, has been printed there. We ought to have the whole note before us. We ought to have the note of the entente allies, as they are called, in reply to the German note. We ought to have the Swiss note. We ought to have the Spanish note. We ought to have all these important State documents in official form. It is only just to us, just to the country, and just to the executive department, that before we discuss these questions we should have these papers before us in such a form that we know that they are accurate and official. We have none of them now, except the President's note.

I think to carry on this discussion on the basis of newspaper reports is not the way in which so serious a subject should be approached. I had hoped that sufficient time would be allowed to enable us to get those documents and those papers from the State Department, so that we might know before we acted. Also, I think the terms of the resolution require amendment; but that is a question of detail.

Therefore, Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska, that I hope he will allow the Committee on Foreign Relations to consider this question. I trust, also, he will realize that this thing can not be hurried through. We must have an opportunity to discuss a matter so grave as this, which involves our relations with all the nations of the world. It ought not to be, and it can not be, hurried through as if it were some general matter of no special importance.

Of course, if the Senator prefers to let the resolution remain on the table, to come up to-morrow, I am not going to make any objection or make a motion to send it to the Foreign Relations Committee; but I am sure that there will be time for us to give it the discussion which it certainly deserves.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I think it is unnecessary to send this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The resolution is simple in its terms, stating only a single proposition. What is that proposition? The President sent an identical note to the various belligerent powers of Europe, which note has been laid before the Senate officially. We have that; we know what that is. The resolution of the Senator from Nebraska is that the Senate approve this action of the President in sending to these belligerent nations the communication referred to. That is the whole of the resolution.

This note called upon the nations engaged in war for a statement as to the exact issues involved between them; in other words, to let the world know just what are the real, essential issues at stake in this bloody contest, and asking for such suggestions as might be made by them to us, a friendly power, as to the terms upon which peace might be discussed between them. That is a simple, plain forward proposition, quite easily understood. There is nothing in the note of the President to the powers that can not be easily understood. He sent this note of inquiry, asking questions of vital and world-wide moment. The act of the Chief Executive was manifestly taken with the hope of opening the door to negotiations which might lead to peace, which might lead to a cessation of these frightful hostilities which appall the world. Now, the question before the Senate to-day is whether the President acted rightly and whether we approve what he did. Why not take the judgment of the Senate on that? What is the need of sending that question to a committee, to have a committee debate it, and bring forth to you a report of their opinion?

The only possible good affirmative effect of any action whatsoever taken by the Senate must be the good effect of having the Senate approve the act of the President. If it is to amount to anything, the Senate must express itself as being in sympathy with the movement projected by the President to bring about world peace and normal world conditions. That is a question which necessarily addresses itself to every Senator here on the floor of the Senate, as well as it would to Senators in a committee room. If this resolution is to be referred to a committee, if a committee is to take it up and debate it for I know not how long, if it is to be made the subject of delay, if the Senate hesitates to approve the President's act, then the moral effect of even an approving Senate expression will be diminished.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has suggested that the resolution should be discussed in a committee, and that we should wait to have all the papers that are to come from the different belligerent powers in reply not only to the German note transmitted through our Government, but also the replies to the President's note. We would no doubt through these papers get the point of view of the belligerent nations when these papers come; but at this moment it seems to me we are up to this question: Whether the Senate, without waiting for foreign advices, shall express its own point of view on the President's note. Did the President do right in asking that the warring powers should state concisely and definitely the questions at issue and the terms upon which they would consider peace proposals? Shall we wait to hear from the capitals of Europe before we say whether we approve or disapprove what the President did?

Mr. President, I see no need of referring this resolution to a committee. I accord with the view of the Senator from Nebraska, since it is his request, that the resolution go over until to-morrow. I have no wish to foreclose any expression from any Senator with respect to this matter. Let every Senator say what he thinks; but I think, inasmuch as this matter is here in the form in which it appears before us, that the Senate should speak its opinion right out without any kind of evasion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I favor the adoption of a resolution such as has been suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. On the 20th day of April, 1916, I introduced in the Senate a resolution calling upon the warring powers for a calm consideration of the views that impelled the restoration of peace; and later on, on the 3d day of May, I offered a substitute for that resolution, which was then pending in the Foreign Relations Committee. I think it might be well, in addition to the approval of the President's note, for the Senate itself to make some expression upon this subject; and I shall therefore call attention to this substitute resolution for the one originally introduced by me, in the hope that it may furnish some suggestions upon this matter. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon, with retired pay, certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19300. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

OSAGE INDIAN SCHOOL, OKLAHOMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6864) providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 10 years from January 1, 1917, which were: On page 1, lines 7 and 8, to strike out "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior"; on page 1, line 10, to strike out "not exceeding 10 years" and insert: "1 year"; on page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out ", on the condition of establishing vocational instruction in such schools," and to amend the title so as to read: "An act providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of one year from January 1, 1917."

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator state what are the amendments of the House?

Mr. OWEN. The House limited the extension of the fund for the maintenance of the Osage school to 1 year instead of 10.

Mr. SMOOT. Is that the only amendment?

Mr. OWEN. That is the only amendment.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask if the Indians themselves object to continuing the school?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall have to insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair under the rule laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill and a motion was made to concur in the amendments.

Mr. LODGE. At that point the privilege expired.

Mr. OWEN. I think it will take no time at all.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection if it does not displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rule that it did not displace the unfinished business. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. LANE. I ask the Senator if he will not allow the bill to go over. I received a communication this morning protesting against this identical measure, I think.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that the half-breed element oppose it and the full bloods are in favor of it, and that is where the matter stands.

Mr. LANE. I do not know; but there was a claim made by a man representing himself to be an Osage Indian that these Indians maintain their own schools; that they have paid their taxes for public schools; and if this is the measure, although I may be mistaken, that there was no necessity for a further continuance of this institution at their expense. I should like to have time to look at it and check up against it. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for, which is the unfinished business.

PEACE OVERTURE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield for a moment, but I should like to have the resolution read which I sent to the desk.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] if he will consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business until we can decide whether my resolution shall go over until to-morrow by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution has gone to the calendar under the rule. It is disposed of now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think we have had unanimous consent on other occasions under such circumstances.

Mr. LODGE. We had no unanimous consent; it never was granted. The resolution, under the rule, has gone to the calendar. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. GALLINGER. That is debatable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not insist upon the motion at this time. It will simply delay matters and the resolution will not be disposed of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am certainly in sympathy with the bill represented by the Senator from Michigan, but I feel that I have not been properly treated with this resolution. The resolution came before the Senate as a privileged matter, and I then, in order to concede to views on the other side, asked that unanimous consent be granted that it go over until to-morrow. Now the Senator from Massachusetts desires to take advantage of a technicality to deprive me and my resolution of what was about to be granted by unanimous consent and what he himself had consented to. I have no other recourse except to make the motion, unless by unanimous consent my resolution may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I made no objection to the unanimous consent. The Senator failed to get unanimous consent and now the resolution has gone to the calendar under the rule. I do not see why the Senator should try to put the resolution forward and crowd everything else out of the way. All I ask is a fair discussion, and I can assure the Senator that he will not advance his resolution by adopting these high-handed methods.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not adopting such methods. I have endeavored to do everything by unanimous consent, Mr. President; the Senator from Massachusetts himself consented to it; and by unanimous consent now this can be done.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Could we by unanimous consent now permit the resolution to go over to occupy the same position that it had before 2 o'clock?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think so. It has been done on other occasions.

Mr. SMOOT. The resolution is on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The status of the resolution now is fixed, under a ruling of Vice President Sherman, as being on the calendar. That is the status of it, which would have to be changed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I have no recourse except to make this motion, and I make it only for the purpose of bringing the resolution before the Senate long enough to get unanimous consent for its consideration to-morrow. That is my only purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will have the same right to-morrow morning at the close of the morning business.

Mr. STONE. He has the same right now. Why not do it now?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, of course, can do it now, if he wants to.

Mr. STONE. He has made the motion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Can we not by unanimous consent take the resolution off the calendar and give it the status which it occupied before 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that that can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I make the request.

Mr. BORAH. I think we ought to do so for the reason that the Senator from Nebraska understood, and all understood, that it was to go over until to-morrow, but by reason of the fact that a Senator was occupying the floor it went to the calendar. As to the resolution in its present form, I am not speaking for the resolution when I make this suggestion, but I think if unanimous consent can be had under the rule it ought to be given.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is evident, Mr. President, that that can be granted. I hope the Senator will ask for it, and I hope it will be granted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall have no objection to the resolution going over until to-morrow if it is to be considered during the morning hour, but the Senator from Nebraska has asked for its status to be fixed for determination to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not asking for that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If unanimous consent is granted so that the Senator's resolution shall take its place on the calendar for consideration to-morrow the same as though it had not gone to the calendar to-day, I have no objection to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, I make the request that the resolution be taken from the calendar for consideration to-day, and that it go over under its privileged character for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Would this displace the unfinished business?

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated that it would not.

Mr. LODGE. It comes up only as a resolution to-morrow at the close of the morning business, occupying then the same position it occupied this morning.

Mr. JONES. The Senator's request was that it be taken up for consideration to-day.

Mr. LODGE. No; from the calendar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That it be taken from the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Taken from the calendar and placed where it was before with the privilege it then had. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I now ask that the resolution which I sent to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 303), as follows:

Resolved, That the people of the United States of America, consisting for the most part of the children by birth or descent of the warring nations in Europe, view with profound distress the continuance of a war, calamitous to all and beneficial to none.

From the small beginning of a movement made by a Teutonic State to punish a Slav State for an alleged conspiracy against its national life, resulting in the assassination of its Crown Prince, the most destructive and frightful war in history has resulted.

The distinguishing characteristics of this war include on the part of each participant the disclaimer of responsibility for its commencement or continuance, the assurance that it is not animated by a desire for conquest, the declaration that it is fighting for its national life, and mutual protests against dominant individual militarism either on land or sea.

The frightfulness of the past two years has surpassed the predictions of the most sinister imagination. The warring nations are dimly conscious of the terrors of the future, through the experiences of the past, but interlocked in the deadly but indeterminate struggle of the trenches, can not stop to deliberate. The continuance of the war means loss to all and gain to none. The only hope of peace lies apparently in the exhaustion of all, accompanied perhaps by a barren victory for the power whose exhaustion is least complete. Victory so attained will be at a stupendous cost, far exceeding its value, and thus the only result of continued warfare will be the common deterioration of race and impoverishment of condition.

The Senate of the United States, conscious that this Government owes a duty to posterity in the maintenance of the long-established principles of civilized warfare as applied to neutral rights, and fearful lest it be drawn into the vortex, seizes this opportunity when its relations with one of the warring powers are in the balance to urge the combatants who are now conducting the world's tragedy to express in some concrete form, without acrimony, taunts, or threats, what proposals can be made the basis of a desired peace, and to suggest to the Teutonic powers that having accomplished the declared purpose of the war, the punishment of Servia, they may, without imputation of weakness, make such reasonable proposals regarding the restoration of the status quo, the gradual reduction of military burdens, and the substitution of reason for force in the adjustment of international disputes as to command the favor and impress the judgment of the people of the neutral and warring nations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, when this matter comes up for discussion I shall ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me in May last regarding the restoration of peace in Europe in connection with the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska. I have no fixed views now as to whether it is wise to add anything to the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska, but it may well be a subject of serious consideration as to whether an independent statement made by the Senate of the United States expressing its views regarding this calamitous condition will not be of great influence in bringing about a restoration of peace. I invite particular attention to the suggestion in the resolution that whatever proposals are made should be made without acrimony, taunts, or threats.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have in my hand a very important and illuminating editorial from the New York Sun in reference to the matter that has been under discussion. I ask unanimous consent, and I do it at the request of several Senators, that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT WILSON ATTEMPTS TO PLEDGE UNITED STATES TO REVERSAL OF TRADITIONAL FOREIGN POLICY.

NEW YORK, December 26.

The New York Sun, in a strong editorial, points out some of the serious implications of the recent "peace note" of President Wilson. The Sun says:

"Mr. Wilson may not be proposing peace; he may not be proposing mediation; he may not be interposing his hand or his head between the belligerents who are fighting this European war; he may not be suiting his acts to Germany's present desires—but the fact remains that he is not only proposing something which no President of the United States ever before proposed, but also pledging this Nation to something which no President of the United States has the right or the power to pledge.

"That something is the annihilation of the Monroe doctrine, which has governed the policy of the Republic for almost one century of the Republic's existence.

"Mr. Wilson speaks with feeling of the interests of the United States as a neutral power in relation to the war waged for European politics.

"There is no other interest of the United States of such transcendent importance as that which lies behind the traditional refusal of our Government to mix in the political affairs of the European nations and its traditional determination, so often and in so many forms declared, to permit no European interference with the destinies of the Republics of North, Central, and South America, no extension of European political influence in the Western Hemisphere.

"We are not discussing the merits of the Monroe doctrine or now examining its health to see if it is senile, moribund, fit for no further progress except a journey to the last resting place of obsolete and superseded national policies. We merely call attention to the outstanding fact that the proposal and pledge which occur in the course of President Wilson's eloquent expression of the natural hope of American civilization and humanity to see peace restored on a lasting basis would incidentally send the Monroe doctrine straight to the tomb. This is not to be dismissed as a matter of academic interest; its bearings on our international relations are those of a revolutionary change with practical consequences immeasurable. It means not only the utter abandonment of our attitude of aloofness from the complications of European politics, but also the absolute surrender of the position which we have maintained against all comers with regard to the American Republics south of our border. The participation of the United States in European guaranties inevitably means the entering of the European powers into the affairs of the Western Hemisphere wherein we have assumed and exercised an exclusive function. Specifically, it means European cooperation and tutelage in the affairs of Mexico, of Guatemala, of Honduras, of Nicaragua, of San Domingo, of Costa Rica, of Panama, of Colombia, of Venezuela, and so on, down to the jumping-off place of Pan American policy at Cape Horn. There is no avoiding the fact that the United States can not abolish one-half of the Monroe doctrine and preserve intact the other half.

"Here is President Wilson's proposal and his pledge:

"'In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interests, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or Government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.'

"In this passage as the World justly remarks, 'the President pledges the cooperation of the United States in the enforcement of future guaranties of the peace of the world and the integrity of the small and weak nations of Europe. It can not be made too clear that whether this is or is not a desirable departure from past policy, it is a departure involving not only our participation in the control of the destinies of Belgium and Servia and Roumania, but also participation of Great Britain and Germany and Russia and France and Italy in the control of the destinies of Mexico, of the Central American States, of Venezuela; why not even of Cuba?

"For—the Monroe doctrine thus blithely swept away in the exuberance of emotional rhetoric is beyond the power of President Wilson to annul. The Government of the United States, by the joint action of Executive and legislature, has officially declared the Montroe doctrine to be its policy. Our participation in the peace conferences at The Hague, and our assent to the conventions there framed, were distinctly qualified and limited by this declaration:

"'Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not entering upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions or internal administration of any foreign State, nor shall anything contained in the said convention be so construed as to require the relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.'

"As the American historian of the first peace conference at The Hague, himself one of the American delegates, well said: 'Not even in the supposed interest of universal peace would the American people have sanctioned for one moment an abandonment or the slightest infraction of a policy which appeals to them as being founded, not only upon legitimate national desires and requirements, but upon the highest interests of peace and progress throughout the world.' And the general conventions both of the first conference at The Hague in 1900 and of the second in 1907 were ratified by the Senate of the United States with this broad and significant reservation specifically recorded as part of the contract.

"President Wilson can, if he sees fit, propose the relinquishment of the Monroe doctrine as the traditional policy of the United States by negotiating with European countries new treaties affecting the entry of this Government into political entanglements of European concern and conversely admitting European powers into political engagements of purely American concern. The Senate of the United States can, if it chooses, validate such proposed treaties by the constitutional process of ratification.

"But until that has been done the Monroe doctrine stands as our declared policy in international relations, and there is no more power in the White House to extinguish it, or to pledge the people and the Government of the United States to the guarantee of European boundaries, than there is in this newspaper or in the executive offices of the Pennsylvania Railroad."

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in the interest of expedition, I had thought to consume no time of the Senate in discussing this bill. It has been before the Senate and on its calendar for several years and is, I believe, well understood by most, if not by all, Senators, but inasmuch as so much prejudice has been displayed and so much misinformation has been submitted it seems best that I should state briefly its provisions and objects.

The bill proposes to establish a retirement roll for the benefit of honorably discharged volunteer officers of the Civil War. It is offered in compliance with precedent established by Congress in 1828 and 1832 when the surviving officers of the Revolutionary War were placed upon a similar roll with full pay of the highest rank held by them in that war, not exceeding, however, in any case the full pay of a captain.

The officers and men of the Revolutionary War were inadequately paid, but at the close of that war Congress gave the officers full pay for five years thereafter. It also gave to officers and privates large grants of land. Each enlisted man received 100 acres and to officers, according to their rank, larger grants were made. To a captain 300 acres were given, as I recall it now, 500 acres to a colonel, and so forth. Many of the States also gave lands in even larger amounts to their Revolutionary soldiers. In some States, North Carolina, for instance, 25,000 acres were granted to a major general.

Furthermore, it is approximately, but all too tardily, carrying out what was supposed to have been a sacred promise made to these men by their Government through its Congress and President in 1861. That promise was that the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates organized under the acts calling and providing for volunteers should in all respects be placed on the same footing as to pay and allowances of similar corps of the Regular Army; that every volunteer received into the service who should be wounded or disabled in such service should be entitled to the benefits which had been or might thereafter be conferred upon members of the Regular Army.

There has been some question exactly as to what those acts of Congress were, and I will insert in full the acts of July 22 and July 25, 1861. Those enactments must be construed as one act, the second having been passed but three days after the first, and evidently to make a correction in the first. The act of July 22, 1861, section 5, provided:

And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth shall, in all respects, be placed on the same footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the Regular Army.

Opponents of the bill say that was intended to apply simply to the pay of the volunteer officers and men during their service in the Civil War, but three days thereafter the same Congress passed this act, as if to correct an omission which had been made in the first law:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Volunteers authorized by this act shall be armed as the President may direct; they shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be upon the footing, in all respects, with similar corps of the United States Army, and shall be mustered into the service for "during the war."

Afterwards, in August, The Adjutant General of the United States promulgated this order to the Army, quoting the two statutes, the one of July 22 and the other of July 25, thereby stating to the soldiers who enlisted that they should be treated not only for the present but for all time the same as were the officers of the Regular Army, and if any benefit should accrue to an officer or private in the Regular Army because of his service in the Civil War, that benefit should also accrue to the volunteer.

It seems to me there can be no possible question as to that proceeding. This promise meant, if it meant anything——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Have any copies of those acts been printed, specially for this discussion, where we could lay our hands on them?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have just read the sections, but I will include the whole acts of July 22 and July 25 in my remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was under the impression the Senator had them put in the RECORD before and that we then could get a copy of the RECORD containing them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The act of July 22 is in the House hearings. The act of July 25 is not in the House hearings. For some reason or other that has been omitted, but I will put both acts in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. They appear in General Orders, No. 49, issued by Adjt. Gen. Thomas on August 3, 1861.

The acts referred to are as follows:

[General orders, No. 49.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 3, 1861.

1. The following acts of Congress are published for the information of the Army:

"An act to authorize the employment of Volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property.

"Whereas certain of the forts, arsenals, customhouses, navy yards, and other property of the United States have been seized, and other violations of law have been committed and are threatened by organized bodies of men in several of the States, and a conspiracy has been entered into to overthrow the Government of the United States: Therefore "Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept the services of Volunteers, either as Cavalry, Infantry, or Artillery, in such numbers, not exceeding 500,000, as he may deem necessary, for the purpose of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, enforcing the laws, and preserving and protecting the public property: * * *

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Volunteers shall be subject to the rules and regulations governing the Army of the United States. * * *

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates organized as above set forth shall in all respects be placed on the same footing as to pay and allowances of similar corps of the Regular Army. * * *

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any Volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have or may be conferred on persons disabled in the Regular Service; and the widow, if there be one, and if not, the legal heirs, of such as die or may be killed in service, in addition to all arrears of pay and allowances, shall receive the sum of $100. * * *

"Approved, July 22, 1861."

"An act in addition to the 'Act to authorize the employment of Volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property,' approved July 22, 1861.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept the services of Volunteers, either as Cavalry, Infantry, or Artillery, in such numbers as the exigencies of the public service may in his opinion demand, to be organized as authorized by the act of the 22d of July, 1861: Provided, That the number of troops hereby authorized shall not exceed 500,000.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Volunteers authorized by this act shall be armed as the President may direct; they shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and shall be upon the footing in all respects with similar corps of the United States Army, and shall be mustered into the service for 'during the war.'

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall be authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the command of the Volunteer forces, such number of major generals and of brigadier generals as may in his judgment be required for their organization.

"Approved, July 25, 1861."

By order.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant General.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes from that point, may I ask him whether there is any change other than that to which he has called attention made by the second act?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No material change. The second act does not confine the words "in all respects" to "pay and allowance," but deliberately omits those words and puts the Volunteers on the same footing in all respects with soldiers of the Regular Army in the Civil War.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The only difference between the two act, then, as I understand the Senator, is that in the second act they omitted those qualifying words.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As to this particular matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As to the particular matter in the second act. In other words, they broaden the act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They broaden the act so as to include Volunteers in all the privileges and benefits which could come to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would seem to indicate very significantly that that was the particular thing they desired to accomplish. Let me ask the Senator, further, was there a report of the committee accompanying the second act?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the second act was not reported by the House committee at all. It was not presented to the committee. The first one was, but the second was not. My attention was afterwards called to this subject by officers who were interested in the matter, and I investigated and found they were absolutely correct in their position.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There was no discussion on the floor of the House in reference to it when originally presented.

Mr. TOWNSEND. When the law was passed? I have not investigated to see.

This promise meant, if it meant anything, that volunteer officers and privates should receive not only the same pay and emoluments as were received by officers and privates of the Regular Army for service in the Civil War, but it meant that any emolument or benefit which, as a result of service in the war, carry to the Regular Army officer should be shared by the volunteer officer for an identical service. The private volunteer was by the act of 1912 rewarded for his service, and to-day he is receiving from 75 to 100 per cent more than he received in the war. But the volunteer officer not only does not receive what he received during the war—and of this he does not complain, for he has never asked for such pay—but by the act of 1890 his pride in and benefits of rank to which he was entitled having earned them through years of the greatest patriotic service ever rendered by men to their country, were taken from him. Prior to 1890 disabled officers were pensioned in accordance with their rank, but the act of that year demoted them to the ranks, although the rank of the Regular Army officer was retained for pensionable or retirement purposes.

By the acts of Congress officers of the Regular Army have been retired upon reaching the age of 64 years and at three-fourths pay of their highest rank. This fact, however, is justified by the opponents of the pending bill on the ground that the Regular officer has been a long time in the service and his retirement is in recognition of such service. Now, I must not be understood as condemning the retirement of Regular Army officers. I know that such action is in harmony with the dictates of notions for the public welfare and the needs of national defense. I am, however, constrained to meet the argument as presented against this bill, and if the comparison is invidious to the Regular Army officer it is not because I am antagonistic to him, but because the opponents of this measure have used him to belittle the service and sacrifice of those men who mustered, trained, and led more than 90 per cent of the men who fought the battles and preserved the Union in 1861 to 1865. More than 95 per cent of the officers of the Regular Army never engaged in a battle, thank God, never knew what actual war was. For years they have been secure in the knowledge that their financial and social career was established for life. Old age, penury, and want have no terrors for them.

This city is decorated with hundreds of old retired Army officers who never saw an armed enemy, who never heard a hostile gun. Hundreds of widows of officers with similar service are living here in greatest comfort, the recipients of their Government's bounty. Not only here are such as these found, but they are scattered all over the country. I am not complaining at this treatment by the Government. I would not take one dollar from these beneficiaries. But what has this Government done and what is it doing for the men, 95 per cent of whom by actual service on the field of battle won the rank which a grateful country then conferred upon them for organizing, training, and leading the forces which preserved the Union and maintained amidst the almost universal standards of monarchy the one great flag of democracy? It is true that most of these officers when the war was over and their country no longer needed their services retired modestly to their homes and helped to repair the waste of war. Some of them were successful in business. They were great men and capable of great things, but most of them had impoverished their strength, impaired their nervous and vital energy during long years of service in camp and march and battle. The opportunities which were theirs when they entered the war were either taken by the home guard or else these soldiers were physically incapable of taking advantage of them. The years rolled on and these men were crowned not with the honor and emoluments which every other great nation has conferred upon those who fought its battles, but with neglect and ignominy.

Time has bred forgetfulness, if not contempt, until, as I have said, the precious boon of merited rank has been taken from them, and when the few who remain, many living in soldiers' homes, others the objects of different forms of public charity, and still a few others in comfort, when these ask that their Government's promises be kept they are held up to scorn and ridicule.

I have stated that these volunteer officers feed that the Government's promise to them in 1861 has not been fulfilled, and I concur in their belief.

When the war closed not all the volunteer officers returned to their homes. Some of them enlisted in the Regular Army, and afterwards, when they reached the age of 64 years, they were by acts of April 23, 1904, June 29, 1906, and March 2, 1907, retired, not at the rank held by them at the date of retirement, but exclusively because of their service as volunteers in the Civil War at a rank and pay one grade in advance of their highest rank in the service. In other words, a captain in the Regular Army 64 years old who had served one day or more as a volunteer in the Civil War is now retired with the rank and pay of a retired major and a colonel is retired as a brigadier general. Under these acts I am informed that about 1,000 officers of the Army and Navy are receiving increased pay solely for service in the Civil War. Can Congress say that the Volunteers have been treated the same as the Regular Army officers? Not only this, but on March 3, 1905, Congress placed upon the retired list of the Army Gens. Hawley and Osterhaus, with rank of brigadier generals. They were general officers of Volunteers in the Civil War and had never served a day in the Regular Army.

Shall Congress longer permit tactics of obstruction to prevent this act of justice to the remnant of its greatest benefactors?

But, sir, there are other than obligations based on contract which impel me to support this bill. Our Nation has embarked upon the policy of largely providing for its defense through the call for Volunteers. Already that system is said to be breaking down. At this moment the militia volunteers feel that they have been induced to enlist under false pretenses; that, indeed, the Republic is ungrateful and looks upon the militiaman as a man who owes a duty to his country not shared by others and that the sacrifice of home and opportunity will finally win for him the title of "old vet" or "old pensioner," and if he shall insist that he is not a pawn to be played for and by others and asks for a discharge he may be branded as coward or traitor. If we are to depend upon the volunteer in case of actual war, our Government must demonstrate that it is not ungrateful and that its word is good. It is already very late to do what ought to have been done a dozen years ago. The beneficiaries are now on an average about 80 years old. They are dying at the rate of about 15 per cent a year, and the death rate is rapidly increasing. Since I first introduced this bill in the Senate there have been six different chairmen of the officers' committee. Five of them have gone to their great reward. These were grand men who survived the carnage of war but sacrificed their lives in an effort to secure recognition of their brother officers at the hands of a Government which they, perhaps, more than any other influence helped to preserve.

A letter was placed in the RECORD some weeks since by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] from a private soldier of the Civil War protesting against the passage of this measure. Mr. President, that letter does not voice the sentiment of the survivors of the great Grand Army of the Republic. Its writer has not only misrepresented his comrades and slandered the volunteer officers of the Civil War, but evidently with malice aforethought he has falsified the facts.

I have stood sponsor for this bill in the House and in this Senate for eight years. It has been known to the Civil War veterans of the country that I was especially interested in the measure, and yet I do not recall having received during that period a communication of protest. I have, however, received memorials from many Grand Army posts expressing sympathy and support. I can conceive of no man more lacking in the spirit of gratitude and patriotism than the alleged private soldier who opposes the bill for the reasons given by the correspondent of the Senator from Georgia. Why, sir, this bill does not affect by the fraction of a mill the pension received by the privates. Note the difference between the spirit of this defamer and that demonstrated by the volunteer officers. Every general pension law written into our statutes has been urged upon Congress by committees composed of volunteer officers. When the act of 1912 was before Congress this committee of volunteer officers asked me to withhold pressure for this pending bill until the general law could be enacted, lest in some way the latter might be retarded. The officers, as in war so in matters of pension legislation, have led the forces to victory.

But the Senator's correspondent says that the services rendered and the responsibilities assumed by the officers were no greater than those by the private soldier. Mr. President, I will not make comparison between the patriotism of officers and men. He who places his all upon his country's altar has made the supreme sacrifice. Whether he leads or follows, whether it is his duty to command or obey, whether he plans the campaigns and directs the forces or blindly follows the orders of his commander, there is no one ranks him in patriotism. That there are, however, grades in service and responsibility is evident to everyone. Every nation has recognized this difference and every nation recognizes it to-day.

The officer as a rule is older and more experienced. As a rule he is selected to command because of his proven fitness. At the beginning of the Civil War he raised companies and regiments and drilled them for service. He was made responsible for the health and lives of the men. He was charged with thousands of dollars' worth of Government property. It was his business to know not only military tactics but to understand the campaign. He furnished his own equipment and paid for his own food. He was the head of his particular division of men, and the military and civil history of the world recognizes the head as of the greatest importance. If it is true that the volunteer officer is entitled to no greater or other recognition than the enlisted man, then our Army and Navy to-day is improperly organized as to pay and emoluments. The officers should receive no more than the privates, if such philosophy is to be applied.

But, Mr. President, the most voluble argument and the most unworthy one used against the bill is its cost. As for myself, sir, I would not be swerved from my advocacy of the measure if I knew it would cost double what I believe it will cost. With me it is a question of sacred obligation and duty and not one of dollars and cents. If it is true that these old patriotic heroes did more than any others to preserve our Union; if it is true that our Government in its time of threatened destruction made promises which have not been kept; if it is true that the greatest security which our Nation may know is keeping faith with the people from whom must come its future defenders; if it is true that a majority of the men who organized, trained, and led victorious armies of the United States from 1861 to 1865 are now either in want or the occupants of soldiers' homes, I hold it to be my patriotic duty to my country as well as to these old men, who at the end of 80 years are now standing in open graves waiting for the falling earth, but with ears strained to catch the word from Washington, which keeps the half-century-old promise to their hearts, I hold it to be my sacred duty to grant this belated recognition. Aye, I hold it to be my duty to vote whatever sum may be necessary to grant this relief.

Let us cut out a few unnecessary river and harbor improvements. Let us refuse to pass a political emergency public-buildings bill, but let us not longer delay even the partial satisfaction of an obligation as high as patriotism and as sacred as human sacrifice.

But, Mr. President, it is right and proper that Congress should know approximately at least the amount of money this bill, if enacted into law, will carry. Unfortunately an approximation of the cost is the best that is possible. Since 1890 there has been no separate lists kept of officers in the Pension Department. They are now rated the same as enlisted men.

Every possible means has been employed to determine the exact number except the unpracticable method of examining all of the more than 300,000 list of pensioners in the Pension Department. There are several ways for obtaining an approximation, and all have been used, and inasmuch as the results obtained separately by each is practically the same as the others, it is absolutely safe to conclude that such result is correct.

First, there are 21 commanderies of the Loyal Legion in the United States whose membership is composed entirely of officers who saw service in the Civil War. They have been especially interested in discovering all the volunteer officers who served in that war. They are peculiarly equipped to obtain information on this subject. They have aided the committee in every way possible.

On January 31, 1914, these commanderies had as members 3,310 volunteer officers. Their investigation induced them to believe that this number was two-fifths of all the surviving volunteer officers, and that there were therefore a total of 8,275 living on January 31, 1914.

On August 31, 1915, these commanderies had 2,960 volunteer officers as members, which was two-fifths of 7,220, the total living at that date. They determined at that time that the death rate was at least 45 deaths a month. It is larger now. From August 31, 1915, to December 31, 1916, is 16 months, and during that time the deaths would be approximately 22 times 45, or 990. Deducting 990 from 7,220, we would have living, under the Loyal Legion calculation, 6,230 volunteer officers.

Second, Henry W. Littlefield, of Germantown, Pa., president of the Pennsylvania Association of Union Volunteer Officers, made an independent investigation through the Grand Army posts, Loyal Legion commanderies, and the Pension Department and presented the results to the House Committee on Military Affairs. He worked out a table showing the number in each of the different ranks and their length of service. His table was inserted in the House hearings on a bill similar to the one pending here. His calculation was of December 31, 1915, and showed 7,200 survivors at that time. If we are to deduct the deaths at 45 a month since December 31, 1915, his total of living on the 31st of December, 1916, would be 6,660.

Third, Col. C. R. E. Koch, chairman of the Volunteer Officers' legislative committee, last year went to the Commissioner of Pensions and asked that several thousand pension certificates be drawn promiscuously from the files and actual inspection be made with a view to determining what proportion of the pensioners were officers and what privates. This was done, and the result showed that out of every 55 pensioners 1 was an officer. In other words, the ratio of officers to privates was 1 to 54. On October 31, 1916, the Commissioner of Pensions reported officially that there were 353,034 Civil War invalid pensioners on the roll. Applying the ratio of 1 to 54, we would have as a result of this actual list 6,419 officers living on October 31, 1916, and deducting 90 for the deaths occurring in November and December there would be 6,320 living on December 31, 1916, according to this calculation.

From these three reliable, yet different, computations, we obtain the following results: The Loyal Legion estimate is 6,230; the Pennsylvania Association, 6,660; the pro rata count of actual pensioners makes the number 6,320.

Now, the Commissioner of Pensions on March 30, 1916, wrote a letter to Congressman Hay, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, submitting a tabular statement showing that there were on the pension rolls on February 29, 1916, 12,598 volunteer officers of the Civil War. How he obtained the number he does not state, and inasmuch as he has repeatedly said that he could not determine the matter, I am curious to know how he obtained this number. I am sure that he has simply made an estimate and that it is as wrong as was his former estimate that the Sherwood bill granting a general increase of pensions to all soldiers of the Civil War would cost $75,000,000. In this regard, I quote from the testimony of Gen. SHERWOOD, given before the House Committee on January 29, 1914. He was speaking about this bill now before the Senate——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think perhaps if the Senator will wait until I get through quoting this extract he will not want to ask the question which he evidently desires to put, because I imagine the subsequent portion will answer his query.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to ask the Senator a question in connection with a statement he has already made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator says the prediction was that the cost of the Sherwood bill would be $75,000,000 a year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In regard to that I wish the Senator would wait until I get through with that branch of the subject and until I come to that question, when perhaps I shall answer it; but if I do not I shall be very glad to have the Senator again ask the question. I am quoting from Gen. SHERWOOD'S testimony on this subject in reference to this very bill or a similar one which was before the House committee. This was in 1914. He said:

> I do not know what the estimate of the department is, but I had some experience with the department on my so-called dollar-a-day pension bill. It was said on the floor of the House by authority of the Commissioner of Pensions that my bill would carry $75,000,000, and after the bill passed, as a compromise between the Senate and House, it was stated in all the leading magazines and in all the papers in a series of articles written by Gen. Adams, of Massachusets, that the bill would carry $75,000,000. So only a few days ago, when I reported my first omnibus pension bill, I presented the official figures of the cost of that bill—
> His general pension law—
> and it was $20,800,000; so that the difference between the estimate made by the Pension Office and certified to as being absolutely correct was the difference between $75,000,000 and $20,800,000, and the figures I gave on the floor of the House and printed in the RECORD only a few days ago have not been contradicted and can not be contradicted.

Now, I imagine the Senator wishes to ask me if I discriminate between the dollar-a-day pension bill and the bill as it was finally passed and became a law. I do.

Mr. BRYAN. The figures quoted by the Senator do not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The figures quoted by the Senator were the figures officially given as to the dollar-a-day pension bill; but Gen. SHERWOOD said that after the bill passed, as it did pass, the department was repeatedly quoted as saying that it would cost $75,000,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the department estimated that the Sherwood bill, as passed by the House, would cost in the first three years an average of $58,000,000 a year. It was estimated that the bill as amended by the Senate, if passed, would cost an average of $22,000,000 a year. Now, it is hardly fair to say that the Pension Bureau made a mistake of over $55,000,000, as is inferred in the quotation read by the Senator, when the figures given do not apply to the situation which the Pension Bureau had in mind at the time. That was the purpose I had in interrupting the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I recognize that——

Mr. BRYAN. The department's estimate of the amount that would have been carried by the dollar-a-day Sherwood pension bill was $58,000,000, and no man can say whether that was an overestimate or an underestimate because that bill never became a law. As to the bill that did become a law, it was estimated by the department that it would cost about $22,000,000 a year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And it cost $20,000,000.

Mr. BRYAN. It cost $20,800,000, according to the figures which the Senator read, which was a pretty close estimate; and those figures are not for the first year or two.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRYAN. The figures the Senator read were not for the first year or two. Does the Senator know what the cost was for the first year under the Sherwood bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have read the statement from the testimony of the author of the bill before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House.

Mr. BRYAN. I am talking about what it cost, and I think that it cost the full amount estimated by the department.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Member from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, who was the author of the bill, made the statement which I have read in his testimony before the committee, in which he says that repeatedly the department stated that the bill would cost $75,000,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the reason I wanted to interrupt the Senator, to state that the bill introduced by Mr. SHERWOOD did not become a law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I said that.

Mr. BRYAN. And it is not fair to say that the department overestimated the expense of the bill $50,000,000 a year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not misstated the facts. I said all that the Senator has said; I had read the testimony of Gen. SHERWOOD, and I do not think there is any evidence to dispute the testimony as given by Gen. SHERWOOD on that occasion.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the facts dispute it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think so.

Mr. BRYAN. There is no occasion for a misunderstanding about that. Gen. Sherwood, according to the hearing from which the Senator has read, stated that the department claimed that the Sherwood bill would cost $75,000,000. He said that, as a matter of fact, it cost $20,800,000, and sought to draw the inference that the department had made that tremendous mistake in its estimate of over $50,000,000, when the department was estimating upon a bill that never passed, which estimate no man, neither Gen. Sherwood nor anybody else, can demonstrate was wrong. The department's estimate of the cost of the bill that finally passed was very close to its actual cost.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think I am correct in saying that the average age of the veterans of the late Civil War is about 70 years at the present time. The officers were, as a rule, much older than the men in the ranks, and I will ask the Senator if I have read correctly in some publication that the officers for whose benefit this bill is intended average about 80 years?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is correct. I do not think anybody disputes that fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that at best this burden, if it is a burden—I think it is an obligation, a duty—will not rest very long upon the Treasury if we pass this bill, as I apprehend we are going to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator is absolutely correct about that.

I should like to discuss a little further the question of the commissioner's estimate of the cost of this bill—that is, the estimate made by him as of February 20, 1916—in which he said that the net cost would be something over $7,000,000, and that there were something over 12,000 living officers at that time, a year ago next February. That his figures are grossly incorrect an analysis of the situation will disclose. He states that there were 13,534 naval and military Regular and volunteer officers who served in the Civil War and on the pension rolls February 29, 1916. He deducts 936 who are now receiving a pension or retired pay in excess of what this bill would give them, leaving 12,598 as the number who would be benefited by this proposed act.

On October 31, 1916, as I have stated, the commissioner made his official report, showing the total number of Civil War invalid pensioners, officers and privates, to be 353,034. Deducting from the total number 13,534 officers, as reported by him, we have 339,860 privates, or one officer for fewer than 26 men. When, however, the test case was made last year by actual count of the pension certificates examined for Col. Koch at the department it was found, as I have stated, that there was 1 officer for 54 privates, and that proportion was thought to be large by everyone familiar with the situation.

No man who employs his reason can accept the ratio of 1 to 25. The ratio of officers to men was not so large during the war and it has been growing less every year since. The officers averaged, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said, from 5 to 10 years older than the privates. Their mortality has been necessarily greater, and it is not possible for me to believe that there can be living to-day more than 1 officer for 50 living privates. So if we apply the ratio of 1 to 50—and that is a very large ratio—to the last report of the commissioner, the total would be 6,665 officers living.

If my statement that there are now living fewer than 7,000 men who could be benefited by the bill, the next question to be determined is the additional cost to the Government which it would incur, and to determine it we must apply the provisions of the bill as to retired pay. And at the outset let it be understood that the pensioned officer who comes under its provisions will not thereafter draw his pension. In other words, retirement pay is in lieu of pension, and from the total amount carried by the bill must be deducted the amount now paid in pensions in order to obtain the actual net additional cost to the Government.

Now, in determining the total cost of the bill we must again use an approximation. The bill provides that officers of the Army and Navy who served in the Civil War for two years or more and were honorably discharged may be retired as of the highest rank held by them, on a payment for life of one-half the salary now paid to Regular Army officers of similar rank, and that the officer who served one year may be similarly paid one-quarter such salary, and those who served not less than six months may be paid one-eighth of such salary, but in no case can an officer be paid more than three-fourths of the initial pay of a captain in the Army. If we knew the exact number and length of service of all these officers, we could readily multiply and determine the total amount. But here again the records of the Grand Army of the Republic posts, the Loyal Legion commanderies, and the Pension Department have been employed to secure a reasonably correct result. The officers of highest rank are fewer in number and more readily determinable.

The initial salary of a captain in the Regular Army is $2,400, and the maximum that any officer could receive under the bill is three-fourths a captain's salary, or three-fourths of $2,400, which is $1,800. Colonels and officers of higher rank than colonels who have served two years or more are the only men who will receive that sum. Officers below the rank of colonel who served two years or more receive one-half of the salary now paid to officers of equivalent rank in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, and in every case one-half of such salary is less than $1,800. Colonels and officers of higher rank than colonels who served one year would receive one-half as much as the officer of equivalent rank who served two years, or $900, and colonels and officers of higher rank who served six months would receive one-fourth as much as the officer who served two years, or $450.

Lieutenant colonels who served two years or more would receive one-half of the pay of lieutenant colonels to-day, or $1,750. Lieutenant colonels who served one year would receive $825. Lieutenant colonels who served six months would receive $412.50.

A major who served two years would receive one-half of a major's salary to-day, which is $3,000, or $1,500. A major who served one year would receive one-half as much, or $750, while a major who served six months would receive $375.

A captain who served two years would receive one-half a captain's salary, which is $2,400, or $1,200. A captain who served one year would receive $600, while a captain who served six months would receive $300.

A first lieutenant's salary to-day is $2,000. Under the bill a first lieutenant who served two years would receive one-half that amount, or $1,000, and one who served one year would receive $500, and one who served six months would receive $250.

A second lieutenant who served two years would receive one-half of a second lieutenant's salary, which is $1,700, or $850, and those who served one year and those who served six months, respectively, would receive $425 and $212.50.

Col. C. R. E. Koch, chairman of the committee of volunteer officers, submitted a table to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House as of December 31, 1915, which showed that on that date there were approximately 144 colonels and generals living, 216 lieutenant colonels, 360 majors and officers equivalent to majors (surgeons and paymasters), 2,520 captains and officers of equivalent rank (assistant surgeons and chaplains), 2,304 first lieutenants and officers of equivalent rank (adjutants and quartermasters), and 1,656 second lieutenants, a total of 7,200 officers of all ranks.

Since that table was made on December 31, 1915, a year has elapsed, as I have stated, and the death toll has been at least 15 per cent. It is certain that at least 30 per cent of the colonels and generals have died. I have letters, I think, which mention several hundred deaths.

Now, just what length of time each officer served it is impossible to determine, but from the figures which have been presented by the department as well as those furnished by the different Loyal Legion commanderies and Grand Army posts it is safe and fair to suppose that much the larger number served two years or more and therefore would be entitled to the maximum pay under the bill. It is also absolutely certain that the number of who would draw $1,800, the maximum provided for any officer, would be small. It is also true that the retired pay of captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants who had served but six months would be less than the amount of pension which they are now receiving, and therefore, except for the distinction which comes from official recognition, there would be no inducement for these short-term men to come under the provisions of the bill. If they did come, however, it would be at a sacrifice in pension or pay, and to that extent at least the bill would induce a saving rather than an additional expenditure. For instance, a captain who served but six months under this bill would receive but $300 a year, a first lieutenant but $250, and a second lieutenant but $212.50, and yet it is undoubtedly true that a majority of them, if not all, are now drawing $30 a month, or $360 annually. There are probably in the neighborhood of 2,000 captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants who served a year, and their pay under the bill would be, respectively, $600 for captains, $500 for first lieutenants, and $425 for second lieutenants, or, in other words, such captains would receive $240 a year more than they are now receiving, first lieutenants $140 more, and second lieutenants $65 additional over what they are now receiving in pensions.

I do not believe that there ever was a more conscientious set of men working upon any problem before Congress than have been the volunteer officers' committees who have devoted their time and attention in order to arrive at the actual cost of the measure. I am satisfied that their work is approximately correct. My own judgment is that the bill will not cost to exceed $3,600,000 the first year and that it will be from 12 to 20 per cent less the second, and the decrease thereafter will be even greater. Under no circumstances can the additional cost created by this bill over and above what is now paid for pensions equal $5,000,000. That it will be much less than that is indicated by the excessive estimates made by the Pension Department in all previous years when pension bills have been before Congress.

I repeat that the death rate among the officers is appalling. The hundreds of letters which come to me from various parts of the United States, giving the physical and financial condition of officers who were once the pride as well as the salvation of the country, have touched me very deeply, and I have felt that it was a disgrace to our Government to allow this condition to exist longer. With the utmost expedition possible in passing the measure through both Houses of Congress scores of these worthy, patriotic men will have passed beyond its benefits.

There certainly can be no legitimate charge made that this movement is political in its nature and designed to distribute benefits for political advantage. These old men, now averaging, as I have stated, at least 79 years of age, have passed the time when they are great political factors in the affairs of the country. They have entered the "sear and yellow leaf" period; and while this bill would bring a degree of comfort to a great majority of them who are now recipients of public institutions, and all of them would feel that they could close their eyes to earth more hopefully if they felt that their posterity could know that sacred promises made in war were not simply scraps of paper, but that patriotism and sacrifice were recognized as its essential fundamental principles by the Republic which they preserved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is well for us, if we can, to reach a reasonably accurate estimate as to the cost of this proposed legislation. We have the report of the Pension Office and of an Acting Secretary of the Interior Department. The estimate of the department was that if this bill had been passed in 1914 the first year's charge upon the Treasury would have been $9,208,159.89. This estimate of the department, the Secretary states, is based upon an estimate made upon a similar bill introduced April 8, 1913. The estimate by the department for the first year on this first bill placed the net cost at $10,283,122 for the first year. The letter of the Secretary declares that the factors used in ascertaining this amount were 16,472 officers then surviving, as determined by deduction on account of percentages of loss by death from a number theretofore found by actual count to be living and borne on the pension rolls. So that the estimates of the department began with an actual count, as stated by the Secretary, and proceeded with deductions based upon estimates. This last deduction allowed 8 per cent deduction for one year, but it made the figures for the year following the spring of 1914, or for the fiscal year 1914–15, as I understand, $9,208,159.89.

According to this estimate, under the present bill the first year's charge upon the Treasury would be between seven and eight millions of dollars. But the Senator from Michigan (Mr. TOWNSEND) doubts the accuracy of estimates by the department, and quotes from a speech of a Member of the House with reference to prior estimates. Mr. President, it need not be a matter of dispute as to what the department estimated with reference to the Sherwood bill, which was before us a few years ago. The Senator from Florida (Mr. BRYAN) states definitely that the estimate of the department for the Sherwood bill as it passed the House was that for the first year it would cost $58,000,000. We know the accuracy of the Senator from Florida, and we know what attention he gave to this subject. We have sent out now and are endeavoring to obtain a copy of the report of the department at that time. We know that fortunately for the country that bill as it passed the House was substantially amended in the Senate, and that the Sherwood bill as passed by the House never became law. Now the Senator from Florida states that the estimate of the department as to the first year's cost of the bill which we actually passed was $22,000,000, which was practically correct. Why, Mr. President, for a Member of the House or of the Senate to undertake to assail the estimates of the department by loosely charging that the department estimated that a bill which we passed would cost $75,000,000 annually, and therefore that estimates of the department can not be relied upon, is for the Senator or the Member of the House to be quite careless in his statements, and very inaccurate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do; but I wish to assure the Senator from Michigan that it is not prearranged upon my part, for I would gladly go on.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of Mr. Daniels for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 2, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit our Heavenly Father, that through the dispensation of Thy providence we have been brought to the beginning of a new year. The past with its experiences, its mistakes and achievements, its defeats and victories, its accumulated knowledge and wisdom is ours by inheritance, if we will. The future looms before us with its perplexing problems, great possibilities, and hidden issues.

Give us wisdom, strength, courage, and fortitude to go forward with renewed faith and with brave and manly hearts remembering that we are not bound to succeed, but we are bound to try and leave the results to Thine infinite wisdom, power, and goodness.

Grant, O we beseech Thee, that the nations now engaged in war may find a happy solution of all their differences, and that out of the turmoil, suffering, and sorrow a light may shine which shall guide us to a lasting peace; that the bonds of brotherhood may never again be broken under the spiritual guidance of our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 22, 1916, was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the international commerce commission. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. By inserting a lot of stuff, or the gentleman's own able remarks?

Mr. MANN. Is that the document which has just been received through the mail and has been printed by Senator FLETCHER?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. A Member of the House ought to have the opportunity to make a statement in reference to an election in his district.

Mr. GARRETT. Let me understand clearly what it is.

Mr. MANN. It is a statement which the gentleman from North Carolina has written in reference to the election recently held in his district.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

RESIGNATION OF MR. QUEZON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, transmitting a letter of resignation of MANUEL L. QUEZON, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 28, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith an official copy of a letter addressed to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands by Hon. MANUEL L. QUEZON, under date of October 15, 1916, in which he tenders his resignation as Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands to the United States.

Sincerely, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

MANILA, October 15, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON,
Governor General of the Philippines, Manila.

DEAR GOVERNOR GENERAL: I beg hereby to tender my resignation as Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands in the United States.

In this capacity I have served my country for seven years, and for the last three I have been fortunate enough to receive the whole-hearted cooperation of the administration of the Philippine Islands.

I am indebted to you for life. Without your cordial and decided support it would have been impossible for me to accomplish anything in the very difficult mission entrusted to me by my people. I want to leave to posterity this public testimony of my deep appreciation of what you have done for the people of the Philippines. They owe you something that they can never in this world repay. You have been in part their liberator. History will yet give you full credit for the unselfish and patriotic devotion to the noble task you have been called upon to perform in these islands. You were sent here as the representative of the Government of the United States, and as such it has been your paramount duty to show us in deeds the ideals of your country, how we are regarded by your people, and what they propose to do by us. You have done your duty. We are now convinced that your country stands for freedom for all; that we are regarded by your people with paternal care, and that they will go to any extent to secure for ourselves and for our children the blessings of democracy. As you have endeavored to relax and have succeeded in relaxing the political ties between your country and mine you have become the bond of everlasting friendly union between your people and my people. You have earned our love and admiration. You are entitled to the recognition of your own Government and of your own people.

Personally you have been very kind to me. You have proven to be my true friend. You know that I am yours for ever.

Very cordially,

MANUEL L. QUEZON.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for six minutes upon the subject of public buildings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for six minutes upon the subject of public buildings. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the article which I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the newspaper clipping.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Ocala (Fla.) Banner, Dec. 30, 1916.]

FRANK CLARK, "THE GETTER."

The big newspapers of the country are hammering FRANK CLARK because he believes that the Public Treasury is a national affair and does not belong solely and exclusively to the big cities.

The Brooklyn Eagle, for example, says:

"Representative FRANK CLARK, of the second district of Florida, which has a population, exclusive of tourists, of approximately 200,000, is chairman of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds."

Because his district is so small the Brooklyn Eagle seems to be possessed of the idea that FRANK CLARK has got no business being in Congress, and, in its opinion, it goes without saying that he has no business being chairman of so important a committee as the one on Public Buildings and Grounds.

In the opinion of the Eagle, the chairmanships of important committees should be the especial inheritance of the Members of Congress from our larger cities, which are supposed to be the depositaries of all intelligence and culture.

Then the Eagle goes out of its way to slander our State in the following fashion:

"But we must come back to Mr. CLARK, 'the getter.' He must not be too severely condemned. Environment has a lot to do with the spirit of getting. Florida is full of environment. In fact, it has more of it to the square mile than any State in the Union. Cynics have said that Florida's population is equally divided between those with the money and those after it. When there is a scarcity of the former, the latter seems to increase. It is an endless chain. What the east coast system takes from the rich it must defend against the onslaught of politicians, whose eagerness may account for the fact that the State legislature meets biennially and sessions are limited to 60 days. What is more natural than that Florida's Representatives in Congress should make most of a limitless opportunity?"

The editor of this paper has traveled just a little bit. He has visited Brooklyn, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Cincinnati, Chicago, and many of the larger cities of the country, and in all of which his heart thrilled and swelled with pride and patriotism as he beheld the splendor and adornments of their Federal buildings. He could well imagine that in grandeur and architectural beauty they put to the blush Solomon's temple and the palace of the Caesars.

They cost millions upon top of millions, but never a word has he heard uttered that it was a wasteful extravagance of the Nation's money. These magnificent structures, costing millions merely for their sculptural figures and other ornamentations, carry with them no taint of the "pork barrel."

It is only when a rural population of a few thousand souls secures a Federal appropriation amounting to a few thousand dollars that the "pork barrel" cry is heard.

On all occasions these big cities act the hog.

They reserve the right to themselves to loot the Public Treasury.

If rigid economy and simplicity is to prevail, why erect any Federal buildings costing five and ten and more millions of dollars?

The business of the country can be done in buildings without any architectural frills and furbelows just as satisfactorily as in one with marble columns, mural decorations, and golden domes that glitter in the sunlight.

Neither do those newspapers in the big cities across the line complain of the millions appropriated for the improvements of their harbors.

The "tainted" cry of "pork" is only heard when an appropriation is asked for for some building, river, or harbor in some rural localities, where the population is supposed to pay the toll and be content.

No wonder FRANK CLARK arose in his seat and in his wrath, in answer to one of his critics, said:

"That is an absolute, bald, unsupported, snaggle-toothed, and unqualified falsehood."

His language was not very parliamentary, but was no more than the occasion demanded.

The Government should not be niggardly or parsimonious. It should erect a Federal building in every incorporated city and town in the United States, and in architectural design and finish it should set the pace. These buildings would cultivate the taste and accentuate the patriotism of the people. They would give them a broader vision of the grandeur and glory of our Republic.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

POSTAL RATES.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the zone system of postal rates for newspapers and magazines.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the zone system of postal rates for newspapers and magazines. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman's own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the vocational education bill (S. 703), and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 10 days be granted to the Members of the House for the purpose of printing their speeches in the RECORD upon this subject.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the latter part of the request, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] if it is his hope to complete the consideration of this bill to-day?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the gentleman that all general debate on this bill has been concluded, and the bill is up now under the five-minute rule and we certainly expect to complete it to-day.

Mr. LEVER. In view of that statement, I will not make another motion. The Agricultural appropriation bill is ready for consideration, but I myself am in favor of this bill and will be glad for the gentleman to complete it to-day.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] intend to take up the Agricultural appropriation bill on Thursday after the conclusion of the Niagara bill?

Mr. LEVER. I do if I can get recognition.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that this bill should be completed early to-day?

Mr. LEVER. Then I shall hope to go on to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 703), and pending that motion he asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen have leave to print remarks on the bill for 10 legislative days.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think I will object to the request for 10 days in which to print remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the vocational-education bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education, etc., with Mr. PAGE of North Carolina in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 703, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture, the trades, industries, and home economics; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to authorize the appropriation of money and to regulate its expenditure.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. When we last adjourned the House bill had been offered as a substitute for the Senate bill, but had not been disposed of. Now the House bill, the substitute, as I understand, is open for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that by unanimous consent the bill, S. 703, was stricken out and the text of the House bill (H. R. 11250) substituted therefor.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. My question is whether that substitute is now subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Under the five-minute rule and under the ordinary rules of the House it is subject to amendment by section.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, under the unanimous-consent agreement that was made this substitute is to be treated as an original bill, read section by section, and each section open to amendment as read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair and the Clerk will read the text of the House bill.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if my request is correct, the first section of the House bill has already been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the Senate bill was read.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. And we will now proceed to read the House bill?

The CHAIRMAN. We will now proceed to read the House bill, commencing with section 1.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I desire to offer an amendment to section 1 when it is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be annually appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sums provided in sections 2, 3, and 4 of this act, to be paid to the respective States for the purpose of cooperating with the States in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects, and teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects, and in the preparation of teachers of agricultural, trade, industrial, and home economics subjects; and the sum provided for in section 7 for the use of the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the administration of this act and for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports to aid in the organization and conduct of vocational education, which sums shall be expended as hereinafter provided.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by inserting at the end of line 7, on page 2, the following:

"Provided, That all sums accepted by and paid to any State shall, by the State board controlling its expenditures, be equitably distributed in all parts or sections of the State, so far as it may be possible and practicable to do it under the provisions of this act."

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment as a friend of the bill, and its purpose is to try to make more specific and, if possible, more certain the fair distribution of the benefits of the measure that are intended by its author and friends.

Assuming that this bill becomes a law and that its provisions are accepted by all of the 48 States of the Union, and that the funds as herein provided are distributed among the States as proposed, the State of Missouri, from which I come, will, it is estimated, receive in 10 years $1,553,980. This sum when duplicated by the State will amount to $3,107,960.

According to the latest information I have been able to obtain we have in Missouri 923,963 children of school age and 9,873 public schools and 584 public high schools. Of course, it will not be possible for every pupil in the State to receive his or her share of the proposed appropriation, nor will it be possible for every public school in the State to receive its proportionate share of this fund, as the average annual amount to the average public school would be only about $31 per annum, which would be so reduced in amount as to be of little value if distributed in that way, but the average annual rate to the high schools of the State if equally distributed would amount to $532 per annum. So that it seems to me that it will probably be desirable to expend this fund in the normal schools, the high schools, and such of the other public schools as are prepared to give instructions in the branches provided for in the bill, but in any event it can and ought to be so distributed as to reach every section of the State and to be helpful to all the boys and girls of every quarter of the country who are striving for or desirous of obtaining vocational training along the lines proposed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. What has the gentleman in his mind as to how they can distribute this money equitably throughout the State? For example, does the gentleman propose in the first place to distribute this money equitably throughout a State?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. My amendment provides that it shall be the duty of the boards in every State to distribute the money that goes to each State equitably over that State.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman would, then, try to instruct the boards to give this character of education in every school throughout the State?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Oh, no; but that the money should be distributed throughout the State equitably, so as to carry a part of its benefits to all parts of the State and avoid the possible danger of its being concentrated in a few places to the exclusion of other parts of the State.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that if the money expended is going to be of any use it must be concentrated to the extent of having an efficient organization wherever they are going to teach these vocational branches?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I think so; but if the gentleman will read my amendment he will find it provides that it shall be distributed by the States, so far as it can practically be done under the provisions of this bill, so that the purposes of the bill will in nowise be destroyed.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman suggest it shall be the duty of the board to administer it in a particular section of a State?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The bill provides that it shall be distributed in proportion to population among the States. I take it that the same principle should be followed of distributing it equitably throughout the State. I know that there is some apprehension on that ground. Some fear that if the money is appropriated and paid to States it may go to a few sections of the several States and the other sections be neglected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. Who is to be the judge—the Federal board or the State board—as to the equitable distribution?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The State board; but I understand their actions in all cases will be supervised by and subject to the approval of the Federal board, but it should be the duty of the State board to try at least to make a fair distribution of the funds.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I just wanted to make an observation upon what my colleague had stated.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. When I get through. The gentleman does not want to do so in my time, I hope.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if the effect of his amendment would not be to take this appropriation out of the control of the Federal board?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Not at all; because the bill itself is not interfered with in the least, and the other provisions of this bill provide that the members of the Federal board shall supervise the entire matter.

Mr. WALSH. But this is in conflict with the other provisions of the bill, is it not?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I think not. This amendment says, "In so far as it is practicable under the provisions of this bill." It is not intended to interfere with its other provisions.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes; I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HUGHES. We have attempted in this bill not to affect the economy of the States. We have guarded that in every possible feature. It is assumed that this board, which is to be constituted under the provisions of the bill in each State, shall best understand how to distribute this money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the gentleman if the State board provided for in this bill would not have better information as to the plan of distribution of this money to the schools, and so forth, which must be submitted to this Federal board for their approval?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I think perhaps that is true. I think that what the gentleman from Georgia suggests is true, but at the same time I think that an amendment like this, incorporated in the bill, would have a good influence upon the State boards and possibly induce them to make greater efforts to secure the fair distribution of the funds throughout a State.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to my distinguished friend that the committee tried not to be captious at all in the drawing of this bill and tried to devote itself to the great principles promulgated in this bill. We felt that we could not go into the minor details. We felt that those should be left to the States, to these State boards, and we discussed this principle and this very question before the committee; and the committee was of the unanimous opinion that this bill carried just what the gentleman really expected and wanted.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The gentleman from Georgia understands that I am heartily in favor of this bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I am very glad to know that that is true. Yes; I know it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I am prepared to give it my hearty support, whether this amendment is adopted or not. But I do know that there is some apprehension in my State that when the money is sent there by the Federal Government it may be concentrated in a few sections or parts of the State. I can not see that the amendment I have offered can do any harm, because it provides that whatever is done shall be done in accordance with the provisions of the bill. It is simply an instruction to the boards of the State that they shall try, as far as practicable, under the provisions of the bill, to fairly distribute the money throughout the State, and would clearly show our intention and understanding when we vote to pass it.

Mr. HUGHES. Should not that be left to the board that is created under this bill? This is taking from them, I think, no rights that they ought to have. It is a suggestion by Congress, by passing this law, how Congress feels the money should be expended.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes. I yield to my colleague with pleasure.

Mr. BORLAND. I observe that by the bill $500,000 is appropriated for agricultural education and $500,000 for industrial education.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It is divided into three parts.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. Now, $500,000 distributed among the States would be only $10,000 distributed throughout each State, and $10,000 more for industrial work, which is separate, however. Now, under a State such as ours, with 114 counties in it, it strikes me it would be hardly practicable to use $10,000, the first experimental appropriation, very widely over a State. It seems to me it would be necessary to concentrate that $10,000 somewhere where results would appear. If the appropriation were larger, it might be expanded. If we made it compulsory that the money should be distributed throughout the State, the money itself would not go very far among 114 counties.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. My amendment provides that—

So far as it may be possible and practicable to do under the provisions of this act.

If it is not practicable to divide it over all parts of the State, of course, under my amendment, they would not be required to do so.

Mr. WHEELER. Then this amendment is simply an expression of opinion on the part of Congress, and does not compel the board to distribute the money over the entire State?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Only so far as practicable under the provisions of this bill, expressing to the State boards the feeling of Congress upon that question.

Mr. WHEELER. As I understand, then, it is an expression from the Members of Congress. The State board can do as they please with the fund, anyway.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why does the gentleman think the State educational organizations can not be trusted to make a fair and equitable distribution of this contribution?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I do not know. I guess they can be trusted, but I know that there is a controversy going on now in my State as to how the money appropriated under the road law we passed shall be divided. There are some people in that State who now favor expending it all on a few roads, and many people in other parts of the State are afraid they may not get their share. It seems to me that it will be entirely proper for this Congress to express its feeling as to how the money should be expended.

I congratulate the author of this bill for his good intentions that led him to prepare and to introduce it, and likewise I commend the several members of the Committee on Education who have participated in perfecting and reporting it to the House for its consideration. Its purposes are praiseworthy, and I hope and believe its practical operation will be very useful to a great many individuals, and of great benefit to the country at large.

After being called upon at the last session of this Congress to vote for more than $843,000,000 to sustain the military arm of the Government, including pensions for service in past wars, and since observing the invitation contained in the estimates now submitted, to vote at this session for more than $892,000,000 for military purposes, amounting together to more than $1,735,000,000 in the two sessions of the Sixty-fourth Congress, it is with a feeling of genuine pleasure and a delightful relief to be given the opportunity to-day to vote for an appropriation like this without associating with its expenditure the contemplation of bloodshed, misery, and death.

This bill proposes within the next 10 years to expend about $45,000,000 in training the boys and girls of our land for useful civil pursuits that will promote their own success and happiness in the world and at the same time benefit humanity.

In my opinion it is one of the most meritorious bills considered by this House in either session of this Congress. I hope my amendment will be agreed to, and that the bill will be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a letter from Prof. W. S. Dearmont, president of the State Normal School at Cape Girardeau, Mo., giving very convincing reasons why this bill should be passed, and urging me to give it my support.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to above is as follows:

MISSOURI STATE NORMAL SCHOOL,
Cape Girardeau, Mo., January 13, 1916.

Hon. J. J. RUSSELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RUSSELL: I have to ask another favor of you, in addition to the many that you have granted. I am informed indirectly through the Hon. HOKE SMITH, Senator from Georgia and chairman of the Commission for National Aid to Vocational Education, that the commission's bill will be reintroduced in the present Congress, in the Senate and House, and that strong efforts will be made to secure the passage of this measure offering national aid to vocational education.

I have read the commission's report very carefully and the bill as introduced in the last Congress. I feel sure that the measure of national aid proposed in this bill is very much needed. This is especially true in the Southern States, and the commission's own investigations and thoroughly reliable investigations made by other commissions and associations show that there are at the present time in the United States fully 2,000,000 boys and girls between 14 and 16 or 17 years old who are undertaking to earn a livelihood in various employments without having received an education that will make it possible for many of them ever to become self-supporting citizens. In other words, these 2,000,000 boys and girls for lack of a proper education are wholly unable to increase their earning capacity and to advance themselves in life to the position of self-supporting and self-respecting citizens. These 2,000,000 boys and girls must at best remain throughout life on the border line between self-supporting and self-respecting citizens and the great body of the submerged classes who are always more or less dependent upon society for their support. No doubt a very large proportion of them will fall into the ranks of helpless pauperism, and many of them will enter the ranks of the criminal classes.

Unless more adequate provisions can be made for the better education of the working classes in this country, this large body of our people, who are absolutely unable to become self-respecting and self-supporting citizens without better educational opportunities, must continue to grow still larger from year to year. Many of the communities in which there is this lack of educational facilities could no doubt supply the need for themselves. In many other communities it is well-nigh impossible for the local communities to meet this need fully. Under the circumstances it seems to me that it is only wise and proper that, knowing all the conditions so fully, the Congress of the United States should come to the aid of the States, for the present at least, and, through the bill recommended by the Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education, furnish part of the money needed in order that the several States and local communities may be brought to realize the importance of this work and may be moved to join with the United States Government in providing for the more adequate education of this large body of boys and girls whose needs at present are being neglected.

We hear very much just now of the need of "preparedness" on the part of the people of the United States to meet certain possible future contingencies. I think that if the great war in Europe has taught one lesson more strongly than another, it is the fact that the best possible preparation that a nation can make, for war even, is to develop its people to the highest possible degree in their industrial efficiency. Industrially, I think the most efficient people on earth to-day, perhaps, are the Germans and the French; and the industrial efficiency of these people has not only contributed to the national wealth, so necessary in war, but has contributed very largely to the ability of both the Germans and the French to manufacture the necessary war munitions and armaments, and no doubt the skilled mechanics of the Germans and the French, even without previous military training, can be very readily trained for duty as soldiers in time of need. Personally I feel that better industrial education and more specific preparation for industrial efficiency for all our people constitute the best possible preparation for the discharge of every social obligation of the citizen, including that of defending his nation, if need be, in time of war.

I hope that among the multitude of calls upon your time you may be able to give this important measure your consideration; and, if it meets with your approval after careful examination of its merits, I hope you will give the measure your hearty support. I feel sure myself that no more meritorious measure has been before Congress during the past two or three years.

Very respectfully, yours, W. S. DEARMONT.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] may be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by inserting, at the end of line 7, on page 2, the following:

"Provided, That all sums accepted by and paid to any State shall, by the State board controlling its expenditure, be equitably distributed into all parts or sections of the State so far as it may be possible and practicable to do it under the provisions of this act."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] is adopted, it will change the plan and purpose of this bill. It is the purpose of the bill as framed by the committee not to interfere with the autonomy of the State, but to let the State work out its own salvation, so far as plans for the expenditure of this money are concerned, except, of course, that they must be approved by the Federal board. Now, if this amendment is adopted, it will put it up to the Federal board to be the judge as to whether or not the State board is to expend this money in one section of the State or in another section of the State or still in another section of the State. That is one difficulty with the gentleman's proposed amendment. Another is that it provides that this State board shall, in so far as practicable, see that the money appropriated by the Federal Government is expended equally or proportionately in the various sections of the State. The plans of the States for the expenditure of this money have not as yet been worked out. We can not tell what those plans will be. Whether they will try to connect up with the public-school system and teach these various vocational subjects through that channel, or whether they will try to form independent schools and classes for this purpose, we do not know. The community in the State that is willing to take advantage of this Federal money will have to put up dollar for dollar to match the Federal moneys. Now, if every division of the State should be willing to put up dollar for dollar in order to get the Federal money, I can see the force of the gentleman's proposed amendment. But suppose that a certain section of the State makes a demand for two or three of these schools and the other sections of the State fail to make any demand. In my judgment, it ought to be left to the discretion of the State board to expend this Federal money when the State matches it, in whatever section of the State there is a demand for these vocational schools.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I dare say that under the terms of this bill the State which I have the honor partly and humbly to represent will get as good a percentage of the appropriation as any. Personally I would have preferred that the States should not shirk their obligation to provide an education for their children. I am not in favor of these schemes for relieving States of all their obligations, nor can I indorse the theory which seems to be held by some gentlemen that what we get out of the Federal Treasury is clear gain. The same people pay these appropriations when they come by this more expensive and circuitout route who pay them when they are collected directly from the taxpayers of the State. But that was not the purpose of my taking the floor. I do not see why there should be any distrust, any lack of faith, in the mind of any gentleman as to the proper distribution of such funds as may be contributed by the Federal Government when turned over to the State educational agencies, and I was much impressed by the point raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who said that his State had 114 counties, and he intimated that if the allotment of butter under this bill is spread over the school necessities of 114 counties it will be so thin as to be of no value. Mr. Chairman, there are about 250 counties in the State of Texas, and that great enlargement of the area for the spreading of this butter makes it, to my way of thinking, still less effective.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman if he has read my amendment? If so he will see that it does not provide that the money shall be expended in all of the counties of any State.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It says "as far as practicable."

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. As far as practicable under the provisions of this bill, in all sections of the State.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not the idea of the gentleman's amendment to meet the clamor which you hear from all parts of the State of Missouri, that they shall get their share? Now, if they are to get so small a share that it will be of no practical benefit, why waste the money?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The report says that there are $1,500,000 in 10 years that will go to the State of Missouri. That is a considerable sum of money. Now, it ought to be fairly distributed and not be concentrated in a few or a dozen schools to the exclusion of all the others.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think a million and a half dollars is a large sum for a great Commonwealth like Missouri, when distributed over 10 years. But even if it is considered a great sum, and it were not granted, I can not believe that the State of Missouri should or would fail to do her duty in the education of her children.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that it ought to be fairly and justly distributed over the whole State?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Frankly I think it ought to be kept in the Federal Treasury.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. But if it is going to be paid to the State, does not the gentleman think it should be fairly and justly distributed?

Mr. SLAYDEN. If it is going to be paid out of the Federal Treasury it is fair to the State to give it to the State superintendent and the board that supports him and rely on their honesty and judgment for its effective distribution.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will.

Mr. FESS. The bill was written on the principle that the control of education would be left entirely with the State board. I fear that this amendment injects an initiation of an opportunity for the Federal board to take control instead of the State board. As I say, the bill was written on the idea that the State board should make the arrangement and that it should be approved by the Federal board. It seems to me that this amendment will change the whole order of the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman's fear is well grounded, but the idea seems to be that the injection of Federal control is not objectionable provided it is accompanied by an appropriation. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. From my standpoint I think there is no more important bill pending before Congress. It is very important to the agricultural States like Oklahoma. I want to say that I am in favor of this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]. If you read the report of the committee, it goes on to state that many children leave school in certain grades below certain ages, and that many are unable to complete the high-school course, and the report indicates that this bill and the appropriation made is really to help the poor boy and the poor girl. That is the class of children who need assistance.

I labored some time the other afternoon in asking a number of questions of those in charge of the bill, how it was contemplated that the appropriation should be distributed, but I am frank to say that I do not believe I got a satisfactory reply. Now, under the terms of this bill, out of the first appropriation for the first year my State of Oklahoma would get a minimum appropriation of $5,000. The State and local community, or both, has to supplement that appropriation by adding another $5,000. So that you have $10,000 appropriated. Now, there are 76 counties in the State of Oklahoma. Will anyone volunteer to advise me how this $10,000 can be expended in a State that has 76 counties so that it is going to help the poor boy and the poor girl out on the farm throughout the entire State?

The wealthy boy and the wealthy girl can, of course, pay their expenses in attending the State university, the normal schools, or the agricultural school or the district agricultural school, but how is this fund going to be expended through the State board of education so as to reach the poor boy and the poor girl out on the farm that it is intended to benefit?

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The State of Oklahoma, when the maximum appropriation is reached, will get $81,000 for agricultural purposes and $22,500 for industrial purposes.

Mr. HASTINGS. But suppose the gentleman from Ohio was a member of the State board of education and there were 76 counties in the State, and you also had a State university, a State agricultural school, six district agricultural schools, six normal schools, and a number of other preparatory schools throughout the State, how would you distribute that fund so as to reach the poor boy and the poor girl on the farm who is unable to pay board or go away from home to some city? How are you going to help the rural school?

Mr. FESS. The committee believed that a Federal appropriation of $100,000 to Oklahoma, being supplemented by another $100,000 by the State—and that is the minimum, because it might be $400,000. That has been the rule as to the contribution by the State, where the Federal Government has contributed one dollar the State has contributed four. That is in accordance with our past history of appropriation, and it is supposed that that will be done later on by the State. It certainly would be unwise for us to undertake to say how it should be distributed in Oklahoma. It ought to be left to the State board of Oklahoma that is on the ground and who would not undertake to divide it up by a common multiple and give five or six dollars in one place, but leave it to the State board to put it in one place or a dozen places or 10 places or 100 places. In other words, it would not do at all for the Federal board located in Washington to undertake to say how this money should be distributed in Oklahoma. That must be left to the State board of Oklahoma and if you can not trust the board there, that is an argument against the bill entirely on principle, because we can not utilize the money. But I think we can if we leave it to the State board.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Ohio is a student not only of this bill but of educational matters in general. He is at the head of one of the principal colleges of the State of Ohio. I want to ask him this question: Suppose you were on the State board of education in Oklahoma, how would you suggest that the $82,000 supplemented by an additional fund of $82,000 could be expended in Oklahoma so as to reach the poor boy and the poor girl on the farm? That is the class that it is our purpose to reach.

Mr. FESS. It is the business of the State board to guard against the waste of it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not want to vote for a "pig in a poke." I would like to be a little more practicable. Is it contemplated that this money should be used in the State universities?

Mr. FESS. It certainly is not, because it is limited to students or pupils under college grade, and that prevents the State universities from getting it.

Mr. HASTINGS. In what schools could it be expended, say, in the State of Ohio?

Mr. FESS. In the first place, there are three funds. One is to pay the salaries——

Mr. HASTINGS. We will take the agricultural funds.

Mr. FESS. When you talk about State universities, I would suggest to the gentleman that none of this money would go to the State universities, unless it receives a portion for training teachers.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will it be used in the high schools?

Mr. FESS. Yes; if they meet the age between 14 to 18.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, will any of it be used in rural schools?

Mr. FESS. Certainly; wherever the State board would apply it.

Mr. HASTINGS. But the State board could pick out any rural school in any county in the State of Ohio, or in any other State it saw fit.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. To the exclusion of all other rural schools?

Mr. FESS. We should not interfere with that from this point. We have to trust the State board upon this matter. We ourselves can not dictate that. The gentleman's fear that it will go to the State universities or to a special college or to some favored institution is not well founded, because it does not go to any institution teaching pupils of college grade. They must be below college grade, except the small proportion that goes for the training of teachers. That, of course, will go to the special training schools, whether it be the State university or the State normal schools or whatever your State board will decide upon.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, these funds will be distributed through the State boards of education, and they may or may not go to the rural schools?

Mr. FESS. It would certainly have to go to the rural schools for the payment of salaries of teachers in agriculture, for there is where the agricultural teachers and pupils are. The gentleman's fears are unwarranted.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am heartily in favor of the principles of the bill. I wanted to make sure about the distribution of the money, so as to guard against the concentration of it in a few schools. I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, because I would like to see each county and each community receive some of the benefits from this appropriation. Thousands of boys and girls are not able to pay board and other expenses of attending schools away from home. The object of this bill is to bring these advantages as near to the people as possible.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I am fearful that this bill when it goes into practical operation will prove a very distinct disappointment. It is an effort to do that which has been tried heretofore concerning other matters, namely, to bring about a cooperation between the Federal Government and the various State governments touching a matter that should belong and does belong either to the one or to the other. If the entrance into vocational educational training is a proper Federal function then it ought to be done by the Federal Government without connecting it with or making it dependent upon State cooperation. If it is not a proper thing to be done by the Federal Government then the Congress should dismiss the subject and leave the matter to the States to work out. Somewhat on all fours with this proposition, Mr. Chairman, is the road bill that passed Congress last year. I believe that when that act goes into operation it will prove a very distinct disappointment to the people throughout the several States. Under the terms of this vocational educational bill, if I interpret the language correctly, States can not enjoy the benefits of it after a certain time unless those States make appropriations equal in amount to the Federal appropriations authorized in this measure. I do not believe that that is sound governmentally, and I feel quite sure that in its practical application a policy of that sort will create local jealousies, will create local contests that will eventually lead to the destruction of whatever good there is in this bill or else will lead away from that to the point where the Federal Government will take over the entire situation. I believe that the bill ought to be re-formed in its entirety, and, as I said a moment ago, if it is a proper funcion upon which the Federal Government should enter, then the Federal Government should do it independently of asking State cooperation or aid.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that we have a precedent for everything incorporated in this bill, for since the foundation of the Goveernment Congress has passed more than 42 acts embodying these very principles.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have very great respect, indeed, for the opinion and good judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I am quite sure, however, that he will understand me when I say that I do not believe that he has given to this question the consideration that would warrant him in forming the conclusion that he states. This question is not a new question, let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee and to the committee. It has been discussed for more than 10 years in educational circles all over the United States. It has not only been discussed from its educational side, but it has been discussed as a constitutional question. The objections that the gentleman suggests have all been carefully considered. This bill is, of course, a novelty, as the good-roads bill was. The gentleman states that disappointment from the operation of this bill and the good-roads bill will occur. I, on the contrary, expect more of satisfactory returns than have ever been promised by the supporters of either bill. This bill is of stimulating quality, and it seeks to do that or to bring about the doing of that which everyone admits would be a great blessing to the country.

If the General Government can do this, as we have the constitutional right to do, if the General Government can bring to bear upon the educational interests of each State this stimulus and assistance that will lead them to extend their work in this direction, then certainly it will be of great benefit to the people of the United States. This fund is to be appropriated in only two ways, neither of which can possibly interfere with the operation of the States or their autonomy in the control of their methods of education. There are only two methods by which this fund is to be applied—first, to the training of teachers, and, second, to the payment of teachers. Everybody understands that this is specialized work. It requires the special training of teachers, and in order to encourage this special training a part of this fund is set apart for that particular purpose. Certainly no one could object to such a method of encouraging that form of education.

And the other method is for the payment of teachers. Gentlemen will understand that this specialized work must be to a great extent taught by expert teachers, especially in the inception of the work, and so the work is graded with a smaller appropriation at the first, to be increased yearly until a maximum is reached. For instance, a township in any of the counties where they may have a half dozen or more schools may not have any teachers that will be able to teach any of these economic subjects or agricultural subjects that we desire to have taught. They should have an expert teacher to go around to the country schools for a while in order to teach them the specialized subjects. There are many ways in which this fund can be particularly applied so that, as suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], it will not go to the benefit of any particular school or section, but will be applied, as he says, and as I agree with him, to the education of the children who will most need it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he can state in how many States of the Union vocational education has already been inaugurated? It says in the report that it has been inaugurated in many localities. In how many different States have they inaugurated this system of vocational education?

Mr. TOWNER. I think in practically nine States. In some other States, however, they have commenced in a desultory way the teaching of vocational education.

Mr. WALSH. And can the gentleman state about how much money has been expended by these nine States and is being expended annually?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not answer that question. I will say to the gentleman, however, it is comparatively an inconsiderable amount. It is not nearly large enough to obtain the practical results we hope to obtain under this bill.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] seems to fear that the participation of the Federal Government in this matter will interfere with the working out by the States of their own educational problems.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit me, I did not make that observation or anything from which, I think, that conclusion can be reasonably drawn. The gentleman, I am sure, misunderstood.

Mr. POWERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I did. At any rate, he was under the impression that this bill would work very unsatisfactorily and that it would be either abandoned by Congress or the Federal Government would have to take over the question altogether. I believe that is the substance of what the gentleman has stated. Is it not true that this bill is merely a proposition to the State to spend so much money under this section, provided we spend so much, and that any State in the Union can take advantage of it or reject it, just as it sees fit and proper?

Mr. TOWNER. That is true to a certain extent, but not wholly true. Certain conditions are prescribed that must be complied with.

Mr. GARRETT. What I wish to say is this: If any State wishes to take advantage of it, that State is paying its pro rata of the Federal taxes. If that State fails through its own entity to tax its citizens to raise a similar amount, it loses both, and, while it continues to pay its taxes which go to the Federal Government, it gets no benefit whatever.

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true, and I will say the same is true in regard to the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River or any other particular appropriation. Not many people of the United States will receive any direct benefit from any particular appropriation. Nine-tenths of all the appropriations we make here in Congress are not so made or so arranged that the entire people of the United States can participate in the benefit, but we hope to make our appropriations, and it certainly should always be the object to make legislation so general as to reach the largest number that we possibly can. In other words, to secure the greatest good to the greatest number. And I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there can be no possible method by which so many of the people of the United States could receive a direct benefit as to bring to them this method of better education and preparation for the active pursuits they must follow when they go out into the world to act for themselves.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman from Iowa understand that the sums appropriated under this legislation by the Federal Government could be used in the payment of a part of the salary of a teacher who, teaching the subjects provided for, also teaches other subjects?

Mr. TOWNER. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman thinks there is no question about that?

Mr. TOWNER. I think there is no doubt about it at all.

Mr. MONDELL. If that is not true, then the sums in a large agricultural State would be of little value in the ordinary common schools?

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true.

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman thinks there is no question about it?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. MONDELL. What raised the question in my mind was that a moment ago the gentleman in his remarks referred to the fact that it might be necessary to have teachers especially trained that might go about teaching these various subjects in the school of a county or of a considerable agricultural community. The gentleman thinks, however, that that would not necessarily be required under the bill?

Mr. TOWNER. No.

Mr. MONDELL. But that in an ordinary district school the teacher qualified to teach agricultural subjects, we will say, or to teach industrial subjects, could have a part of his or her salary paid out of this appropriation?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ROUSE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On December 22, 1916:

H. J. Res. 324. Joint resolution authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1916; and

H. R. 19178. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

On December 27, 1916:

H. J. Res. 282. An act authorizing the Postmaster General to provide the postmaster of Springfield, Ill., with a special canceling die for the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Federal Union;

S. 7095. An act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved August 24, 1912; and

On December 30, 1916:

VOCATIONAL-EDUCATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been and is now to a great degree a very unfortunate misapprehension as to the real purpose and object of this bill, at least as I understand its purpose and objects. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] raises the question that because Oklahoma will receive only $100,000 aid through this bill it is such a small amount that it could be of no particular value in educating the poor boy and the poor girl in Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I said that $5,000 the first year out of the fund would be of no particular value.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, whatever the sum is, the gentleman from Oklahoma and other gentlemen assume that the money that is to be expended in the education of the poor boy and poor girl will be the amount of Federal aid extended plus a like amount of State aid or contribution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope and believe that that will not be the case at all; that the Federal aid extended will only be a very small percentage of the amount that will be expended within the States for these purposes. Take the case of a rural community, we will say, in the State of Oklahoma.

If they are spending now in one county $1,000 for agricultural education, and the State of Oklahoma shall receive $100,000 from the Federal Government to be expended for that purpose, that county will receive aid in proportion only to the number of counties in Oklahoma that will adopt the necessary standards and qualify themselves under this bill to receive aid. It may be 5 per cent of the amount that that county raises for these purposes; it may be 10 per cent, or 20 per cent, as the case may be. But if it is only 5 per cent or 10 per cent, if it is an inducement to that county to raise its standard of agricultural education so as to conform to the standard required by this bill in order to get that aid, great good will have been accomplished in the education of that poor boy and poor girl in Oklahoma.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] fears that the passage of this bill will result in local contests. Mr. Chairman, if the passage of this bill does not result in local contests, the bill in my judgment will very largely fail in the accomplishment of its purpose. I hope and expect it will result in local contests. There will be contests between the localities as to which will be the first to adopt the standard approved by these Federal boards, so that they can avail themselves of the portion they are entitled to of Federal aid; so that instead of this being considered as a proposition of Federal aid plus an equal amount of aid by the State, it should be considered as only a sufficient amount of Federal aid to stimulate the States and localities to give the boys and girls of their States such education as shall be a practical vocational education.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this section was thoroughly discussed by the commission appointed by the President for three months. It was also adopted by the Senate. It was under discussion by the Committee on Education of the House for about 10 months. All three have agreed upon this amendment. I regret not to be able to agree with my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], a man of magnificent ability and judgment. But, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that that amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Oklahoma that there is nothing pending.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee or some member thereof for information as to the meaning of the term "agricultural subjects." This bill provides, among other things, for the paying of teachers and the training of teachers to teach "agricultural subjects."

Now, then, does that include rural credit or cooperative business methods among farmers? That is what I desire to know.

Mr. HUGHES. The word "agricultural" means that which pertains to agriculture, to the soil.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I understand. That is what Webster says. Now, what is agriculture? My understanding is that the word "agriculture" refers entirely to the cultivation of the soil, the tillage of the soil, to the production of plants, and has nothing to do with the business end of farming.

Mr. HUGHES. If the gentleman will excuse me there, we have supervisors and directors out in the field to explain to the farmer and show him how to reduce theories to practice, so that he will study the scientific part of agriculture, and then it will be made operative in the field.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes. That is what I understand "agriculture" to mean, to go out and teach the farmer how to do better farming, scientific farming. I do not understand that that includes business affairs relating to farmers—relating to rural credits.

Mr. HUGHES. No.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is hardly justified in his fears regarding that. The object of agriculture is not alone to produce, because if the farmer produces only he never gets anywhere. It is also the object of the farmer to dispose of his production as well as to produce it. I am quite sure the gentleman has in mind the question whether or not this would include assistants and help that would assist in the solution of questions that would teach the farmer how to dispose of his crop as well as how to produce it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I have no hesitation in saying that the language would include that, in my judgment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, let me ask the gentleman from Iowa, as well as the gentleman from Georgia, if they intended to include the teaching of the system or the principles of rural credits and better business in farming, such as cooperation in business, collective selling and collective buying, and so on?

Mr. TOWNER. I should certainly say collective selling would be within it. I do not know about collective buying. I am inclined to think that possibly might be outside the range. However, I would not venture an opinion on that question.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. What does the chairman of the committee or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] think of it?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. FESS. There were four fields discussed by the commission. One was the agricultural, one was the commercial, one was the nautical, and one was the industrial. The commission decided that commercial education was well cared for in high schools, and therefore need not be treated in this bill. The nautical, which would go to the merchant marine, was a matter that was specialized, and this bill would not take care of that. But the agricultural and the industrial were the two great fields that called for help.

Now, in attempting to designate what would be included in the agricultural, they considered that it would be so attenuated that they chose the term "agricultural subjects," in order to avoid the necessity of undertaking to name certain things, because if you undertake to name anything and do not name everything the things not named would be excluded. Therefore my own opinion is that while the principle of rural credits would not be likely to be discussed to children of 14 to 16 years, it certainly is not excluded from the purview of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: Page 2, line 7, after the word "Provided," insert "That the words 'agricultural subjects' when used in this act shall include rural credits and cooperation in business among farmers."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks which I have already made I think I have explained the purpose of this amendment so that most of the members of the committee understand it. If this act is passed simply providing for the paying and preparation of teachers and directors and supervisors in "agricultural subjects," in my judgment, it may be construed that none of this money can be used to teach rural credits or cooperative business methods among farmers. I believe that would be an unfortunate result. Now, in order that there may be no question about the intention of Congress to include rural credits and better business methods among farmers I have offered this amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman mean that there shall be provided teachers to go out and teach the farmers how to cooperate? I understand that this is to teach the children who are studying in school.

Mr. FESS. Children of 14 to 16 years.

Mr. GARRETT. Between the ages of 14 and 16. Does the gentleman contemplate the hiring of men to go out and teach the farmers how to form farmers' unions and fruit growers' associations and things of that sort?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I mean simply this, that the boy who is old enough to understand scientific methods of farming is old enough to understand the principles of business and of cooperation in business. More than this, we need to educate teachers to teach rural credit and cooperation in business among farmers.

Mr. Chairman, this Nation is perhaps abreast if not in the lead of any other nation in the world in providing instruction to farmers in the methods of farming. This is accomplished by our Agricultural Department, by our great agricultural colleges, by the work that is being done under the Smith-Lever bill, and through many other activities. We are spending many millions a year by these methods, but very largely this large expenditure is used to aid the farmer to produce more crops. Now, in the matter of business methods we are far in the rear of the most of the great nations of Europe. Our farmers are losing many millions of dollars every year because they have not been taught and trained to apply better business methods to farming. Some one has said that in agriculture we must have better farming, better business, and better living. So far as the farmers are concerned to-day the importance of having better business methods is greater than the necessity of having a better knowledge of the principles of scientific farming. We are behind in one matter; we are in the lead in the others; and under this bill it is proposed to leave us still in the rear on that one subject. The one great question for the farmers of the United States to solve in the future, and the one thing above all others that the Congress of the United States should aid the farmer to solve properly, is how to enable the farmer to conduct his business on better principles.

During the last session of Congress we passed a bill making a beginning in the providing of farmers with better credit facilities, but that applied only to land credits and to the question of getting credit upon better terms upon farm mortgages. We have done nothing yet in the matter of providing better personal credit. Our farmers know nothing about cooperating together in order to enable them to have better credit on personal accounts, so that they may transact their business better. The fact is that there is nothing that will do so much to enlarge the products of the farm as will the providing of better credit facilities for farmers and better business methods among farmers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. We have already made a start, but only a start, in the matter of providing farmers with better credit. When you go to Germany, to France, to Italy, and to many of the smaller European States, you find that the farmers not only have special institutions to provide them with farm-mortgage credit but they have thousands of institutions which aid the farmers in having a better system of personal credit and a better business system. In Germany there are over 20,000 cooperative business societies among farmers.

We have had up the subject of providing a better system of marketing. Our farmers do not cooperate in business. All the rest of the business interests of the country are united. In the last half century we have gone from individuals and partnerships in business to the great corporations which dominate and control the business interests of this country. When the farmer sells his product it goes at once into the hands of great corporations, great concentrated business concerns, and these corporations control and finally distribute it among the consumers. We have a very complex system of sale and distribution, so much so that it takes one-half of the value of the farm product in order to get it from the farmer to the consumer. This is not only a great loss to the farmer, but it is a great loss to the consumers of the country. There is too much going to the middle man, and I do not wish specially in that way to throw out any reflection upon the middle men, who constitute the business interests of this country, but still, when confronted with the high cost of living, we must know that the one way to obviate that, the one way to make living cheaper, is to lessen the cost of bringing the products from the farm to the consumer.

So the farmers should cooperate in business, follow the lead of the business interests. Here you are going to pass a bill through Congress providing for the expenditure of millions of dollars, which will go on increasing from year to year, and not any of it may be used to teach the farmers to cooperate in business, and thus be able to help the farmer to produce more products of the farm and to compete with the great business interests of the country and secure his proper share of the wealth that he produces. The way to do that is to teach them to unite in their business efforts and cooperate in their business, and so far as they can sell direct to the customer and thus cut out the cost of distribution.

That is just what I propose in my amendment—that we shall make it plain beyond peradventure and doubt that we may use a part of this money to educate the farmers in better business methods.

Take my own State, her agricultural products amount to $300,000,000 a year. Suppose by better business methods, by cooperation, by reducing the cost of transportation, the cost of manufacture, and the cost of distribution in the sale of farm products there would be 10 per cent saved; that would mean a saving of $3,000,000 annually to the farmers of Oklahoma. But when you talk about going back to the farm, leading the people of the cities back to the farm and having our boys and girls stay on the farm, after all there is one thing that is necessary, and that is to make the farm more profitable. On that point hinges the future of our agricultural interests. Make the farm profitable and the boys will not leave it. The farmers must make money or they can not live in suitable dwellings, they can not have proper educational facilities, they can not have suitable vehicles for transportation, they can not have their houses properly furnished, and can not have facilities and opportunities for self-improvement and recreation. It is not what farmers produce that determines the money they make; it is a question of profits. What do the farmers make? is the question. And what farmers make depends largely upon the use of credit and in cooperation in business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] should be adopted. The gentleman is always eloquent in behalf of the farmers of the country. No man who knows him or who appreciates his long service in this House would say that he has not been a true friend of the farmers of Oklahoma. He has been eloquent in his fight for the interests of the farmers. He wants the farmers to make more profit. He is anxious that the farmers should succeed in business. He is willing to destroy the middle man who carries the product of the farm to the city. He is willing to utterly forget the consumer of his product after it comes into the city. He is for the farmer first, last, and all the time, though it means, in the last analysis, that without his customer the farmer shall stay upon his farm, raise his own product for himself, and get it nowhere.

My idea of the purpose of this bill is that it is to generalize the education of the farmer, to assist at the same time the farmer's best friend, the consumer in the city, by education. If I have read this bill wrongly, it is my misfortune; but my belief is that if the bill is passed at all it ought to be passed not because it specializes in the interest of the farmer or prejudices the farmer's mainstay and best friend, the man in the city——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman think that if the farmers could sell directly to the consumers in the city that that would furnish these products to the consumers in the city at a less price?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly it would.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman see——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Wait a moment. I want more time if I am to be interrupted at length.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will ask that the gentleman have more time. Does not the gentleman see that my amendment is as much in line for the benefit of the consumers in the city as it is for the benefit of the farmers? In fact, the gentleman, I think, hardly construes my purpose correctly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is to go on and state his position over again, I shall have to object. The gentleman asked the question whether or not it would not be a good thing for the farmer or the producer of the product to sell directly to the city man and consumer of the farm product, and I unhesitatingly answer yes. But the gentleman fails to take into account the middleman, whom he has decried, who is not only the man who markets the product but is also the man who constructed the railroad and obtained employment for thousands of men and made it possible for the farmer to obtain the tremendous prices he is now receiving for everything he produces from the toilers in the city. The gentleman from Oklahoma would abolish railroads when he abolishes the middleman; the gentleman would abolish the steamships; the gentleman would abolish the stores; the gentleman would abolish every union of farmers who are brought together for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of farm products when the gentleman destroys the middleman.

Why, a great department-store proprietor declared in public recently that he wanted the middleman destroyed. In that event what is to become of the shop girl? What is to become of the man who goes out to buy of the farmer? What becomes of the man who handles his goods?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the population of this country is not solely upon the farm. One-half the population at least is engaged in industrial enterprises, and if there is a hiatus between the man who is the consumer and the man who is the producer, it is the middle man who is at the service of both. The individual farmer sometimes has a complaint against some commission merchant who may have done him a wrong, and he grieves about it, and he gets it published in the newspapers, and his Congressman comes here and makes frequent speeches about it; but God help the farmer of this country the moment he goes so far as to destroy the means of transportation, the means of communication, the means of distribution, every one of which gives employment to the middle man.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand it, then, the gentleman contends that the middle man renders a distinct service both to the farmer and the consumer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, he does.

Mr. HASTINGS. If that be true, the more middle men the better.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How far is Oklahoma from New York City?

Mr. HASTINGS. About 2,000 miles.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman is a farmer and he is the farmers' friend. He is raising cotton or raising potatoes, I care not which. Let him put his cotton upon his back, or his potatoes and eggs and deliver them to me in New York City. I will pay a fair price for them. If the gentleman will have his farmer do that, he will help to bring about an intercommunication between the farm and the city. All the farmer has to do is to put his product on his back and deliver it. That will abolish the middle man, even if it brings stagnation in Oklahoma. If you are going to have communication, if you want to look at the question broadly, you have got to consider the means of transportation, the means of communication, and the means of distribution. Do not destroy the middle man right off the bat. Give the middle man a little chance for his white alley. Dear Mrs. Farmer in Iowa is not delivering her eggs to the consumers in Philadelphia at 60 cents a dozen—not much. She has not the opportunity to deliver them unless some one constructs a railroad, unless some poor thrifty fellow in my city puts enough money into the savings funds to be invested in the construction of a railroad to bring Iowa to the market, and that is all middle man.

I know people now who are denouncing the railroads, who want to have them regulated to death, and yet on picking up the reports of the savings funds in my city and in New York and in other great centers I find that it is the savings of the poor people, in whose behalf you are constantly pleading, that are maintaining, that are building, the railroads of the country and are bringing the East to the West and the West to the East.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Would it not be possible to deliver some of these things by water transportation? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and the sooner you all get that into your heads in the House of Representatives the better it will be for the welfare of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I think I want this bill passed, not because the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] wants it specialized, but because I believe that the one great crying need of this country to-day is the practical education of the children of the land. [Applause.] There are too many seeking a higher education that fits them only to make other men work, and too few who are willing to be educated to do the work themselves. My father ran a farm of 200 acres in extent, and he failed at it. If he had been scientifically trained, he probably could have made a good living on 40 acres.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is the point. The gentleman's father would not have failed if he had been taught the business of farming. And that is the object of this measure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My father was not able to give me a college education, and the more I get along in life the more grateful I am to my father for having let me go to work at an early age. [Applause.] If I have been useful at all, it has been because I was not afraid to work. I think we are training lots of young men through the colleges to a magnificent champagne appetite when they are not capable of acquiring a beer income. [Laughter.] If this bill proposes to give a practical education through teachers trained for the purpose to the boys who work upon the farms, well and good. If it gives a practical education to the man or the boy who is willing to work with his hands in the city in any of the great industries, so much the better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this amendment will not be adopted. The committee feels that it could not possibly go into all of the numerous details that would surround this bill under such an amendment as that, and therefore I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I will withhold that motion.

Mr. MANN. Make it in 10 minutes.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well, I will make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 1, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PLATT: Page 1, line 9, after the word "trade," strike out the words "home economics," and also on page 2, line 1, strike out the words "and home economics."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in appreciation of the importance of home economics, but home economics is an endless subject, more or less taught and generally pretty well taught in every school in the country, in almost every school in the country, even the district schools, and its inclusion in this bill offers an opportunity to dissipate this whole fund in trifles. It does not belong in this bill at all. This is a vocational education bill, and home economics is not, strictly speaking, vocational education. I think we would greatly improve the bill if we took the question of home economics out of it. I think if the bill is subject to any legitimate criticism it is that it goes too far, anyway, and tries to take in too many subjects. It would be better if agricultural training were taken out of it and that subject left to another bill. We are dividing this fund up in such a way and making the bill so broad that the encouragement will be distributed around so that it may not do any good at all.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has an amendment which we will offer subsequently, limiting the amount to 20 per cent. Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to see it all go out. I should like to have a vote on that.

Mr. TOWNER. Would you like to submit it?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Have you excluded home economics for the training——

Mr. PLATT. On page 2, line 1, I take it out.

Mr. FESS. Was it the intention of the Member to exclude from it the teaching of teachers for home economics?

Mr. PLATT. Why, I think so. It seems to me it is dividing up the bill too much. The States are all teaching home economics now. They do not need any encouragement in this line. It is giving encouragement to something that does not need encouragement and taking away from the subjects that do need encouragement.

Mr. FESS. The very fact that we have so many schools teaching home economics would be an argument for training teachers for that subject, would it not?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly, but I know of no reason why the Federal Government should seek to encourage something which does not appear to need encouragement. An amendment to limit the amount would help some.

Mr. HUGHES. Will not the gentleman withdraw his amendment until we reach the point where an amendment will be in order along that line?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it the gentleman's understanding that home economics includes sewing?

Mr. PLATT. It includes everything under creation—sewing, cooking, and sweeping the floor, and so forth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think we should strike out of the bill that part providing for industrial education of children?

Mr. PLATT. It does not need encouragement. It is already being taught everywhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Evidently it is not, because there are ladies who grow up to be magnificent dancers, and who know nothing about this subject. Why could we not teach them?

Mr. PLATT. You could not teach those ladies home duties no matter how much you might spend.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Let us pass this now.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us dispose of it now.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think with the limitation that is suggested the gentleman would hardly be justified in asking that this amendment which he offers should carry. To do so, Mr. Chairman, would be to exclude one of the subjects of industrial education that has always been connected with the subject of vocational education. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in his views that this is outside of it. If you should adopt the gentleman's amendment you would teach the girls to become shop girls and factory workers and go into trades, and you would give them no instruction whatever regarding home making and motherhood. And that certainly is vastly more important than to become shop girls and milliners' assistants. The subject of home economics has been associated with industrial education from the very commencement of this great movement in the United States. It is certainly as important to teach the girls as it is the boys. The gentleman's view would limit practically the operation of this bill to the teaching of the boys of the United States and leave nothing whatever to the teaching of the girls. All over this country women of intelligence, with philanthropic minds, have become interested in this subject. They believe that the girls who are to become the home makers of the future, should be taught at least the fundamentals of these great subjects on which so much of the welfare and the happiness of the people depend. They are interested in helping to prepare the future mothers of American citizens how to make and keep an American home, how to insure sanitary surroundings, how to make the home attractive, how to care for the injured, how to treat the ordinary diseases and prevent infection and contagion.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Is not that very fact, that people all over the country are already interested in it, the reason why we should not include it in this bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, the gentleman's idea, that because they are already interested is a sufficient reason why we should do anything, is entirely erroneous. It is to satisfy this growing demand that we should act. Men and women are becoming interested in this subject because they see the need of action, and it is to do something that will accomplish the desired results that this bill is framed and presented.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I doubt very much whether they teach domestic science in Port Jervis, in my colleague's district. I was born in that city. I think they ought to teach it there. We do teach it in New York City, and I think they ought to teach it in Orange and Dutchess Counties.

Mr. PLATT. They do teach it as well there as they do in New York City.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I really believe there is no one particular item contained in this bill that will bring so much good to the homes of this country and to the people of the generation that is to come as the assistance and stimulus it will give by teaching home economics. I think it will bring to us a better knowledge of the sanitation of the home, of the care of children, and in first aid for the injured in a dependency on good care and sensible treatment instead of a reliance upon patent medicines and quack nostrums. It will benefit the whole scheme of home-making and home-keeping if you elevate the home in the mind of a girl who thinks too much about becoming a shop girl, or a factory worker, rather than of going into the home and becoming a mother. In my estimation there is nothing that will so enlarge and ennoble the ideal of home-making and motherhood as to make them the subjects of research and scientific investigation. I hope that this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did it come to the attention of the committee that the boys were constantly leaving the farm and drifting into the cities, and was the prevention of that a part of the scheme entered upon in this bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that the young women of the country are very much disposed to leave the farmhouse and respond to the allurements of the city also?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not therefore be judicious, so long as you are going to distribute money throughout the Union, that each State should induce its young women as well as its young men to stay on the farm?

Mr. TOWNER. I would say, "Yes, stay on the farm," rather than enter the factory or the shop. I would say to the girl, "Better stay in the home," until she becomes herself the mistress of a home than to go out into other fields of industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of cooperating with the States in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the States, subject to the provisions of this act, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the sum of $500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $750,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $1,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $1,250,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $1,500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the sum of $1,750,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, the sum of $2,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the sum of $2,500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and annually thereafter, the sum of $3,000,000. Said sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion which their rural population bears to the total rural population in the United States, not including outlying possessions, according to the last preceding United States census: Provided, That the allotment of funds to any State shall be not less than a minimum of $5,000 for any fiscal year prior to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, nor less than $10,000 for any fiscal year thereafter, and of the sums herein authorized to be appropriated the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotment to the States provided for in this section: For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the sum of $48,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $34,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $24,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $18,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $14,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the sum of $11,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, the sum of $9,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the sum of $34,000; and annually thereafter the sum of $27,000.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I make this motion purely to take the opportunity to call the attention of the House to the fact that notwithstanding the statement made by Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, of Boston, we had a quorum this morning to do business. If the newspaper reports that have been published are true, Mr. Lawson made the statement that if the truth concerning some stock manipulations on Wall Street were made public, it would empty the seats of Congress. There are a great many seats evidently that it did not empty.

I do not desire to usurp the functions of any committee that may have this subject under its control, but I feel that the accusations, if they really have been made by Mr. Lawson against the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, should be investigated, at least to clear our own skirts and to exonerate any Members of this House from any blame in connection with this transaction to which he refers, and make Mr. Lawson put up or shut up.

As I say, I do not wish to usurp the functions of any committee, but I have introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives asking for the appointment of a committee of three Members of the House of Representatives and three Members from the United States Senate to investigate the charges made by Mr. Lawson, giving that committee authority to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance, asking that committee to subpœna Mr. Lawson to find out what he knows about these accusations that he has made, and appropriating the sum of $10,000 to cover whatever expenses may be needed.

Now, I do not know what you think about it, but the people of the country pay considerable amount of attention to accusations of this kind that are made against Members of Congress or persons who hold public offices, and I feel that here and now we should set an example in connection with accusations of this kind and, to use a slang expression, "put it up to Mr. Lawson's teeth." I have nothing to fear.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think he is taking these newspaper statements too seriously?

Mr. EMERSON. Well, the people are taking them seriously, and whether properly or not pay much attention to what Mr. Lawson says.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that the mails are filled every morning with the cranky notions of somebody from every State in the Union, and if Congress took time to investigate everything that was said about it, it would not adjourn on the 4th of March, or until the 1st of next January?

Mr. EMERSON. But Mr. Lawson and every man, woman, and child in this country knows that some attention is paid to what he says.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not much. Does not the gentleman know that Mr. Lawson has been scolding, scolding, scolding for some time?

Mr. EMERSON. That may be true, but it is up to us to do something to end these continued accusations and make Mr. Lawson either name the persons guilty or admit he is wrong.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman is not discussing the bill.

Mr. EMERSON. I admit that, but I am taking advantage of this opportunity to urge this House to take some action on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee with reference to the date in this bill as reported. It was reported to the House on February 12, 1916, nearly one year ago; and very properly the dates named in the bill at that time related to the fiscal year 1917. In view of the present situation and the condition of the Treasury I want to ask the gentleman whether he does not think all of these dates ought to be moved forward one year?

Mr. HUGHES. I will state to the gentleman that I had intended to offer that amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman make that motion?

Mr. HUGHES. I will offer that amendment, that all the dates be moved ahead one year, that 1916–17 be made 1917–18, and 1925 be made 1926.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent that all the dates be corrected.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent that they be moved forward one year.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] asks unanimous consent that the bill be so amended as to move up one year the various dates set forth in section 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry. Was that request granted as to the dates all through the bill, or simply those in this section?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair stated it, it applied only to section 2.

Mr. HUGHES. I think it ought to apply to all the dates in the bill.

Mr. MANN. The dates run all through the bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I intended to include all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes a similar request as to the dates appearing in subsequent sections of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an observation that is very pertinent to this bill and all other bills of this character.

Of course, the Federal Government exercises its beneficient influence very largely through the expenditure of money. This bill calls for an appropriation, during a 10-year period, of $38,400,000. At the present time there is considerable question in the minds of Members of Congress as to just exactly how the expenses of the Federal Government should be met. Yet there is an increasing demand upon the part of the people that the Government engage in various activities helpful to the people, similar to the one under consideration.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a few minutes. These subjects include not only this great work, which means the development of the industrial and agricultural population of the country to a higher producing value and a higher social life, but rural sanitation and good roads and countless other activities of the Federal Government which are exercised in that way.

Now, my theory is, and always has been, that the important question is not how much money the people spend, although that question is often thrown at us, but the important question is as to the way in which that money is spent. If we spend the money of the people wisely and in a way which reflects a better industrial and social life of the people we are justified in spending it and in raising the taxes for that purpose, and I am perfectly willing to do it. But the fact that we are engaged in these enlarged activities and these constantly increasing demands is, in my judgment, another reason why we should not waste the people's money, why we should not throw any of it away, and why every dollar that we make the people pay for the activities of the Government should be expended for the efficient operations of the Government.

At the beginning of the last Congress and of this Congress I called attention to the fact that we waste between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 a year of the people's money by not requiring a standard day's work of eight hours of our employees in the District of Columbia. I have figured it up that this $38,000,000 expended during a period of nine years is just a fraction over $4,000,000 a year. In other words, for years we have been wasting in the District of Columbia enough money to carry on this kind of an activity all over the United States. I want to put that fact in the RECORD in connection with this bill, because I think that the people in the country who are interested in this subject and the people interested in rural sanitation, in good roads, and in other activities of the Government, are entitled to know whether there is or is not money available in the Federal Treasury to meet the demands of these activities. If we had an efficient operation of the departments in the city of Washington we would be in a position to spend this money to-day without a single dollar of additional drain upon the Public Treasury.

Now, that is not all. We are not only wasting four and a half million dollars of the people's money to-day in the present operation of the departments in the District of Columbia, but there is a propaganda going on for a Saturday half holiday all the year in the District of Columbia. They now get a Saturday half holiday 13 weeks in the year, and they want it for the other 39 weeks. That will mean 19½ more working-days taken off from their year, which is only 208 working-days long now. They work 208 days and they want 19½ days taken off that. That is practically a 10 per cent reduction in their working time. If these men give any service to the Federal Government at all in response to their employment that means that we would have to increase the force 10 per cent in order to do the same amount of work for the Government. That means an addition of $5,000,000 to the $50,000,000 pay roll now in the District of Columbia. In other words, that little demand, so innocent, so insidious, for a half holiday 39 more weeks in the year for this favored class of Government employees means the expenditure of $5,000,000 of the people's money, or more than enough to carry on the activities involved in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask my friend from Ohio, Dr. FESS, what his understanding is and his interpretation of the words "rural population" in the bill?

Mr. FESS. The commission made the figures of 2,500; that is, all cities that would have a population of over 2,500 would be urban and cities with 2,500 and less would be rural.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not think it necessary to embrace in the law a definition of those terms.

Mr. FESS. It was thought that it was not necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, the understanding of the gentleman is that "rural population" has a definite meaning?

Mr. FESS. Yes; under the law for the taking of the census, as we understood it.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no legal definition even under the census law, is there?

Mr. FESS. There is in my State; I do not know about the Federal law.

Mr. MANN. Does not this bill provide that it shall be according to the census?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The language is—

Said sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion which their rural population bears to the total rural population in the United States, not including outlying possessions, according to the last preceding United States census.

I suppose that would control it. Mr. Chairman, I want again to call attention to the language of the bill relative to the payment of salaries of teachers. I asked the gentleman from Iowa a short time ago whether he understood that a part of the salary of a teacher could be paid out of this fund and he said he thought there was no question about that. That is very important, but it seems to me that the language of the bill is such that we might have a comptroller who would decide that none of these sums could be paid except for the salaries of teachers whose time is wholly occupied in teaching these particular branches. That could all be made very clear and definite by slight amendments to the bill. I shall not offer such amendments, but I suggest them to the committee; instead of using the words in section 2 "the salaries of teachers, supervisors," and so forth, the word "the" be stricken out and the word "for" inserted in lieu of the word "of," so that it would read "in paying salaries for teachers, supervisors," and so forth. And then in section 3 a like amendment, so that the language would be "in paying salaries for teachers of trade," and so forth.

I am perfectly willing to leave the language of the bill as it is if it is clear beyond question that these sums can be used in payment of part of the salary of a teacher in a district school, that part of the salary which was proper and in proportion to the time that the teacher used in teaching these subjects. Unless that is clear and definite beyond question, the funds appropriated would be of little value in an ordinary country school.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask whether this would cover the gentleman's objection. Here is a school that teaches commerce but does not teach industrial vocation. The question of the gentleman is, Could that teacher, teaching now commerce, that is not provided for in this bill, be paid to add to his teaching field the teaching of vocational trades?

Mr. MONDELL. I think I can better explain what I mean.

I can explain what I mean by referring to the case of an ordinary district school or a small graded school in which there might be one, two, three, or four teachers, but the size of which would not be such as to justify the employment of teachers to teach agriculture or home economics or trade or to teach any one or all of these subjects—a school where the instruction must necessarily be given by teachers a considerable portion of whose time is occupied in teaching other subjects and other branches. If the appropriation is going to be of real value except in the city schools, it must be clear that the appropriations could be used to pay a part of the salary of a teacher teaching a variety of subjects in addition to those specified in the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. I want to say that there is no question about the proposition that the teacher can be paid a part of his salary out of this fund and at the same time teach other subjects.

Mr. MONDELL. I have had that assurance from several members of the committee; but at the same time the fact remains that the language of the bill is such that an auditing officer inclined to be a little technical could, with a considerable show of reason, hold that none of this appropriation could be used except to pay the salary of teachers whose time was exclusively occupied in teaching subjects provided for and appropriated for in the bill.

It would be very regrettable if that should be the interpretation, because that would deprive the small communities of the benefits of the appropriation, and it would include practically all of the agricultural communities. I shall not offer an amendment. I am offering these observations simply for the consideration of gentlemen who have studied the bill and are familiar with the provisions, so that, if there be any question at all in regard to that, amendments may be offered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the general provisions of the bill. I was much impressed by what the gentleman from Tennessee said a moment ago, and the fear expressed by him that there would be great disappointment relative to the benefits that might be derived from the legislation. It is true beyond a question that if the character of instruction and preparation for instruction provided for in this legislation were to be paid for wholly and exclusively in this country by these appropriations, or by these appropriations supplemented by an equal appropriation by the State, if that was to be all and the end of it, then our people would be greatly disappointed.

As I have said, they would be greatly disappointed, because neither the sums proposed to be ultimately appropriated, nor twice those sums, nor several times those sums, would be sufficient for the instruction of the youth of this great country in industrial lines in home economics and in agriculture.

The principal virtue that the bill has, according to my point of view, is the virtue of stimulation. If the bill shall stimulate instruction in these lines, if it shall have the effect of challenging the attention of the country and the communities of the country through these appropriations and these aids to the necessity and the importance of these lines of study, then we shall have accomplished a great good, and it is only because I hope and believe it will so stimulate instruction along these lines that I vote for the bill. I have but little confidence in it as a mere Federal contribution to aid the communities and provide for this instruction. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], or what I assume to be his attitude, that in the main the communities must provide for the education of their own children. I have had some doubts as to the wisdom of the Federal Government engaging in this sort of thing at all. It can not in my opinion be justified from the viewpoint that it is an aid coming from on high, from the Federal Government to the people of different districts, which they must have or otherwise their people will not be educated. It can only be justified upon the ground suggested by several members of the committee, that it will stimulate and encourage industrial education, the sort of education which we so very greatly need in this country. That it will lead to increased activity, increased expenditures, for these purposes for the excess of the sum that must be contributed to match the Federal appropriation. If it does not have this effect, it will, indeed, be disappointing.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto conclude in 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the gentleman defer his motion a little bit.

Mr. MANN. I think we better make some agreement as to time.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto conclude in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments pending thereto conclude in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. MADDEN] may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience in the matter of educating boys along industrial lines, and my judgment is that this bill will not under its provisions accomplish the object sought. The distribution of the fund proposed to be appropriated in the bill, if apportioned throughout the States as the bill indicates, will result in nothing more than the expenditure of the money, in my judgment. If you want to accomplish industrial education or vocational education, whatever you may please to term it, you will have to establish educational plants along the lines that you propose to teach, where you will have a complete plant, where the boys and the girls may be educated from the ground up in the art of mechanics or whatever the line may be. You can not select a teacher here and there who can occasionally say to those under his jurisdiction, "You ought to train your minds along certain lines"; but, Mr. Chairman, you must teach the hand to work with the mind if you expect the coming generations to be proficient in the different callings in which they may be required to exercise their abilities and energies. I recall very well several years ago that boys learning different lines in the building trades learned only to use the tools of the trade. They were experts in the use of the tools, but they knew nothing whatever about what the material they were shaping with the tools was intended to be used for after they were through with it. So a few of us who were engaged in the building trades organized a trade school, and we maintained the trade school at our own expense in our State.

We compelled every apprentice boy indentured to a trade in the building line to attend this trade school for three months every year, and there we taught those boys mechanical drafting, we taught them all of the complicated questions connected with the building art. They were learning how to use the tools at their work, but they knew nothing whatever about the place the material they were making had in the building which was to be erected. They knew nothing whatever about how to measure tensile strength, they knew nothing about carrying loads or the weight of material and the character of construction that was required to make the building safe. We taught them that, and we compelled every man who employed an apprentice to send his apprentice boys to the school and to pay their full compensation during the period of their attendance at the school. Later on the State of Illinois took over this school, and the State of Illinois is to-day conducting this school. We are educating men in the building arts at the expense of the State of Illinois, and we are educating men and women in the art of agriculture at the expense of the State of Illinois. We are going to continue to do that. If the Government of the United States, through any appropriations that may be made by Congress, expects to accomplish any results, you are bound to consider the question of a complete plant in which every branch of the trade sought to be taught to the children who attend the schools can be displayed to their minds. You must teach them how to handle tools; you must teach them how to use their brains; you must teach them how the things they make are to be applied, and that is something you can not do in the ordinary school.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's talk is very interesting. Did these boys who are taught the primary work in the building industry learn that in private establishments?

Mr. MADDEN. They learn the primary work in the private establishments, but they are compelled to attend school while learning it, and the man who employs them as apprentices is compelled to pay them their salaries while they are at the school.

Mr. COX. They get their practical work in the private establishments?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. And while doing that work they are compelled to go to school?

Mr. MADDEN. They are required to go to school for three months in every year.

Mr. COX. How old were these pupils?

Mr. MADDEN. They can not begin to learn the trade until they are about 14 or 15 years of age, and they are required to serve four years before they can be graduated.

Mr. COX. And they must continue in that school for three months during all of the four years?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Some years ago in our State we determined to teach agriculture, and we were up to the question of whether we should establish separate schools such as the gentleman speaks of or whether we should conduct the work in conjunction with existing high schools. After canvassing the situation pretty thoroughly we decided upon the latter course and have established some 30 or 40 agricultural schools in Michigan in connection with high schools. And, if the gentleman's time is not too limited, I would like to tell him how that worked.

Mr. MADDEN. I would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. KELLEY. The State pays half the expense in conducting those schools in connection with high schools and the district pays the other half. The teacher is supplied from the agricultural college. Now, in the spring the classes in agriculture are taken out into the surrounding country and they study orchards; they study the crops during the various seasons, also animal industry, soil, and everything that pertains to farming. And the system has worked out most satisfactorily. And at the same expense we are educating in Michigan probably thirty or forty times as many young men as farmers as in Wisconsin, where they have adopted the other plan, that of having separate institutions.

Mr. MADDEN. They likely could do that with agriculture, because the farms are adjacent to the country schools, but you can not do it if you are going to educate a man as a machinist or a stonecutter or carpenter, or for any other trade, because you have not the plants.

Mr. KELLEY. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Not very far from your city of Chicago is the city of Gary, where they connect the public schools with the industries of the city, and as a part of the regular course of instruction in the high schools boys work a certain number of hours in the factories of the city. Why could not that plan be adopted everywhere?

Mr. MADDEN. They can work at a certain trade where they have a factory, but the thing is to realize before you take this money out of the Public Treasury that you are not going to accomplish the object for which you are making the appropriation unless you adopt some different method than the one proposed in the bill.

Now, I am for the bill, but I am largely for it as a matter of sentiment, and not because my judgment dictates that the plan is wise. The gentleman is an educator, a prominent one, distinguished in his State and in the Nation, and recognized as one of the leading educators of the country; but quite as distinguished men as he have appealed to me to vote for this bill and advocate its adoption, men from my own State, and when I asked them the reason why they were for the bill they said that it would bring $2,700,000 to the State of Illinois. I said, "If you want to get my vote for the bill and my assistance to enact it into law, you have got to appeal to my brain and not to my avarice, for, after all, Illinois is able to educate its own children, and for every dollar that Illinois gets out of the Treasury under this bill she will pay $20 in. We are paying the bills to maintain the Government of the United States, and there is not any inducement whatever to the State of Illinois and States like that to pay $20 in order to get $1 out; and we are able to do the work ourselves." However, if the bill will in the least particular advance the cause of education, or make for greater efficiency among our future citizens, or the better qualify them to successfully compete in the struggle for supremacy, or add to the prestige of the country, or prepare it to meet the competition of other nations in the race of life, I am in favor of its enactment into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I doubted at one time whether I would be able to attend the session of the House to-day on account of my health, but I have always entertained a desire to do something to pass the pending bill. We have had it up frequently in the House and in the Senate, but owing to a disagreement on the part of the two Houses were compelled to delay final action by sending it to a commission. It is not what I would like to have. It is not all we need, but it is a beginning; it is an entering wedge on what I consider one of the greatest pieces of meritorious legislation ever submitted to the American Congress. It only carries an appropriation of thirty-odd millions of dollars over a term of years. It really ought to be at least $30,000,000 for the first year instead of $500,000.

The people of this country are going to demand of Congress and those who are elected to serve them that they shall go into the question of national aid in the construction of public roads thoroughly, and hand in hand with that they are going to demand that of the immense amount of money collected from the taxpayers and disbursed through appropriation bills that every boy and girl of this country shall have an opportunity to be educated not in a 5 or 6 months' school but in a 9 or 10 months' school, by competent teachers justly and adequately paid.

I have always regretted as a southern man that certain leaders of the South in Congress, when that great Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Blair, proposed national aid for education, did not pass his bill. They objected to it on the line of being a violation of the Constitution and in conflict with the rights of the States. Had that measure become a law thirty-odd years ago the South, where the great bulk of the illiteracy of the country existed, would have been educationally cleared up.

Now, Europe will be prepared at the end of the present war along vocational lines. I received a few days ago in the mail an illustrated book mailed in London, England, showing the pictures of the women, girls, and boys who have been trained industrially in the various manufacturing plants of England. If we are going to seriously enter upon the question of preparedness in this country, let us begin by educating our children [applause] not only in the public schools, but let us go far to equip them with a vocational or practical education in the right way. It would be the greatest blessing and good we could confer upon the American people, and would be of great and lasting benefit to the Republic. We would get more for the dollars we would spend in that way than if invested in any other way.

Now, I want to commend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES], in charge of this bill. This measure, I am sure, is not all he would like to have it. He has had to contend with the Senate committee, and we have all been here long enough to know that in proposed legislation, where there is conflict of opinion, we must concede and compromise; but I want to commend him for his hard, efficient, and zealous work, and at the same time I want to say that the State of Georgia never committed a greater mistake than in not returning him to Congress. Had his reelection been submitted to a vote of this House, in my opinion there would not have been a dissenting voice. He would have been the choice of every Democratic and every Republican Member. [Applause.]

While I have served in this House eight years, I would rather go out of it with my name as the author of a vocational education bill than anything else to my credit.

I commend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] for the splendid work he has done not only for his district and State and the South but for the entire country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want anything that I may say regarding this bill to be construed as opposition on my part, for I shall be pleased to vote for the measure when the time comes. I am frank to say, however, that I shall vote for it with many misgivings. I have grave doubts as to the accomplishments of its practical operation and as to whether much that is promised will be performed.

I was greatly impressed with the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to the effect that the duty of education belongs either to the General Government or to the State government, that it did not nor could not belong to both. I have frequently wondered during my service in this body as to where the demands for Federal aid will ultimately lead us. In the last year I have witnessed the appropriation of money for the relief of the flood sufferers in the Mississippi Valley, for combating the citrus-fruit canker, for the construction and maintenance of good roads, and now, at last, for education. The purpose in each instance was primarily a State duty, a State obligation. I have sometimes wondered, if the States are determined to shirk their obligations and their duties and are determined to depend upon the National Government for their performance, if in the evolution of the hurrying years the General Government will not say to the States, "If we must bear the burden of your obligations; if we must perform your duties; if you are determined that the General Government is to assume all of these, then to the extent of such assumption we will take of your sovereignty."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. REAVIS. In just a moment. I find many Members talking loudly of State rights who are silent on State duties. These Members are breaking down State sovereignty. In all of these Federal-aid propositions the General Government is slowly, insidiously encroaching on the powers of the State. In the good-roads bill we have the provision relating to the Federal Government's supervision and maintenance of the road after construction.

The evil of that is not in the supervision of the road. The evil of it is the encroachment of the General Government upon the sovereignty of the States. In this bill we find in some measure a Federal board supervising the educational facilities within the States. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. The Federal board initiates nothing in this bill, but simply approves of plans to be initiated by the various States, and, second, no State can get a dollar from the Federal Government without matching it with the dollar that the State furnishes. That is cooperation, and not gratuity.

Mr. REAVIS. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the object of this bill is for the General Government to offer a financial consideration to the States for performing a manifest duty. In only nine States, as we are informed, has vocational education been inaugurated. We are now offering not only to those States, but to the rest of the States of this Union as well, a financial consideration as an inducement to them to educate their children. We are by this bill saying to them, in effect, "If you will perform your duty you shall have this money, otherwise you shall not." It is true that the plan is to be formulated by the State boards, but the plan as formulated by the State boards can not be acted upon without the approval of the Federal board, so that in the last analysis you will have the General Government taking over the sovereignty of the States with respect to the education of the children within the States. I think I can see as a part of the philosophy of this movement for Federal aid—it may not come in your time or mine, but it will come sometime if the present tendency be continued—when the State will retain only that portion of its sovereignty which it demonstrates it can perform better than the National Government, and in the survival of the fittest, the National Government, if this process keeps on, will eventually take over those duties and obligations and sovereignties of the States which it can perform better than the States themselves.

I think it but wise that we consider which way we travel, that we may in some measure learn of our probable destination.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, am I encroaching upon the time that has been allotted?

Mr. CANNON. Go ahead.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois has some time.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that 10 minutes remain.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. There remain 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent for five minutes, not to interfere with the time allotted?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, while we are philosophizing touching these matters, I should like to indulge in just a few moments more of discussion. I have been very much impressed with the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] and the way in which he points out the danger of the encroachment of Federal power. If I may be permitted to make this observation, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that all the encroachments of Federal power since the War of Secession have been made through the use of the taxing power of the Federal Government, and the reason for it is this: The citizen has not known when he paid his Federal taxes. The system of taxation has been indirect, rather than direct. The State taxation has been direct. The citizen has known when he paid his State taxes, because he went to the collector's office and he took the cash from his pocket, he paid it over, and he obtained only a tax receipt in return. He has not known when he paid his Federal taxes, because of the indirect system of taxation. The hand of the tax gatherer was hidden. The natural result has been—a perfectly natural result—that the State legislative bodies have hesitated to appropriate moneys for those things for which they probably should have appropriated money, and so there has come a demand upon the Congresses to make appropriations for things for which the States themselves should have appropriated. I believe gentlemen who have studied the history of taxation in this country and the development of the institutions of this country within the last 40 years will agree that that statement is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will; certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. How will my friend from Tennessee reconcile the fact that up until the last four or five years the States were increasing their taxation very much more, proportionately, than the National Government was?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not agree with the fact stated by the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I can not give the gentleman the exact figures, but I think the gentleman will find that within the last quarter of a century, up until the time these extraordinary expenditures for preparedness, and so forth, were imposed upon the Federal Government, the increase of State taxes was very much more, proportionately, than the increase of national taxation. I will say that in very many of the States of the Union now it is five or six times per capita greater than the amount of the national taxes.

Mr. GARRETT. To that State, or taking the country as a whole?

Mr. TOWNER. To that State. Not all the States have made a like increase, of course.

Mr. GARRETT. I shall not quarrel with the figures presented by the gentleman. He is doubtless more familiar with them than I am; but I do undertake to say that during the 12 years I have been in the House of Representatives there has been this constant pressure upon Congress continuously to take care of things that ought to have been taken care of in the States themselves. I think that will increase. I do not anticipate that we shall learn economy here until the Federal Government goes to a basic system of direct taxation. When it does reach that point, then there will be economy in the Federal expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to trespass upon the time of the House, but may I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for 5 minutes more, not to be taken from the 30 minutes agreed upon for debate upon this section. Is there objection?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to this request, but I wish to give notice that at the conclusion of the gentleman's five minutes I shall have to object to any further extensions.

Mr. GARRETT. The time for debate upon this section having been limited by motion, I withdraw my request.

Mr. CANNON. I think I am entitled to the other five minutes, and I will yield the remaining time, if I may, to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. No; I will not take the time of the gentleman from Illinois. I withdraw my request.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I agree with some of the things that they have said. Not having given much attention to this bill, I am trying to find out whether I am going to vote for it or not. As I have heard it discussed and have glanced over the report and over the bill I have wondered whether, if it be enacted, it will result in much good to the people whom we are trying to benefit, and that means all our people, the present and the coming generations. In many of our State governments we have too much machinery. We have too much machinery in Illinois. Think of it! As nearly as we can find out, 100 commissions, with separate jurisdictions, with secretaries and employees, and all kinds of expenditures. Our expenditures in Illinois are climbing and climbing. I hope and believe there will be a reform there in the way of lessening expenditures and giving better service. It is wonderful how we are progressing in the Federal Government, too, in the matter of personnel. I quite agree with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] and I sympathize with the fear expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. But what does this bill propose? It proposes cooperation with the States in the expenditure of a comparatively small amount of money, with the approval of the Federal Government. If this bill passes I apprehend that very little of the money that is provided to be appropriated from year to year will ever get to the 14 or 16 year old boys and girls. I apprehend that the Bureau of Education here will grow marvelously. I am not now speaking of any individual, but it is wonderful how machinery increases and what a grist it will grind when there is something paid for it. I say again, I doubt whether I shall vote for the bill. Oh, if you want me to express a desire that all people shall be educated practically, I have that desire; but there seems to be a great deal of sympathy for the farmer.

The farmer in Illinois does not need any sympathy. He has made his way. We have gone through much of effort and sometimes of suffering, but the farmer in Illinois—and I think generally, so far as I know in all the States, certainly in the Northern States—is better off than the other two-thirds of the population. The farmers constitute one-third. If you could put all of the other two-thirds of the people into a mixing machine and grind them all up together, including the magnates, the plutocrats, the college professors, the Socialists and the uplifters, the millionaires, and the business men of all kinds and thoroughly mix them so you could not distinguish one from another, you would find that the one-third of our population, the farmers, could give to either of the other two-thirds cards and spades from every standpoint, both in wealth and intelligence, and then win. So I resent somewhat this desire to be charitable to the farmer. He is able to take care of himself. That which costs nothing is not appreciated. We are getting much by direct taxation, when we could have gotten it just as well, without increasing the cost of living, by indirect taxation, the same as we have done in former years. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I do not intend to start an economic discussion or a discussion as to the proper method by which the money is to be raised at this time. I notice that we are getting great amounts of money from the income tax and the inheritance tax and other direct taxation, but we are keeping that taxation away from the multitude. When we took off the stamp tax in the last session of this Congress our honorable friend the majority leader [Mr. KITCHIN] said the stamp tax was not popular. I asked him why he did not refund it, and he said it would take too much bookkeeping to refund that which had already been paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of cooperating with the States in paying the salaries of teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the States, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $750,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $1,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $1,250,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the sum of $1,500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, the sum of $1,750,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the sum of $2,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, the sum of $2,500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, the sum of $3,000,000; and annually thereafter the sum of $3,000,000. Said sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion which their urban population bears to the total urban population in the United States, not including outlying possessions, according to the last preceding United States census: Provided, That the allotment of funds to any State shall be not less than a minimum of $5,000 for any fiscal year prior to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, nor less than $10,000 for any fiscal year thereafter, and of the sums herein authorized to be appropriated the following sums, or so much thereof as may be needed, shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotment to the States provided for in this section: For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $66,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $46,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $34,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $28,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the sum of $25,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, the sum of $22,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the sum of $19,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, the sum of $56,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, and annually thereafter the sum of $50,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Ohio a question which was suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] some time ago as to whether this money could clearly be used for the payment of teachers who were engaged in teaching, for instance, home economics and other subjects. I call his attention to the language in section 9, which is:

That the appropriation for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects and of teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects shall be devoted exclusively to the payment of salaries of such teachers, supervisors, or directors having the minimum qualifications set up for the State by the State board, with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education.

Is not there really danger that a teacher who only gives a part of her time to these subjects would not come in under this provision, and would it not be made certain that she would by adopting the slight change of language which was suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FESS. My own opinion is that section 9 does not exclude the right of a teacher who is teaching commerce, for example, to add to his teaching some such thing as provided for in this bill.

Mr. BENNET. I do not state dogmatically that it does. Of course, it does not affect the city that I have the honor in part to represent, because where we have a manual science teacher or any one of those teachers, he devotes his whole time and is supposed to be specialized, and in most cases he is. But it did seem to me that the bill ought not to keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope of the rural community, but, of course, the gentleman is far more directly interested in that than I am.

Mr. FESS. Section 9 was written by the commission before the committee got hold of it, and it was to prevent the money from being expended for a purpose foreign to that of the bill, and that very point suggested by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Wyoming was discussed, and it was thought that there was no embarrassment or confusion of any kind. If one school wanted to add a subject provided for in this bill that was not already in its course, if the State board would permit it, it would get the amount required. But that must be exclusively used for that teaching—the part they get from the Federal Government must be used for the exclusive purpose of teaching the additional subject.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman may be right, but as I get older and more gray headed I realize the benefit of the maxim "safety first"; and, in view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming that the slight change of language would remove all doubt, it seems to me and I suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be worth while to return to the section and amend it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As to section 9, the only limitation is that the payment of the money must be to teachers who have the minimum qualifications set up by the State board.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; I read that.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman read, and I do not see how he makes any application further.

Mr. BENNET. It seemed to me that the language, taken in connection with section 3, some State controller might raise a doubt. I am not offering an amendment. I am not dogmatic about it.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they may get a crazy State controller somewhere, but I do not think any gentleman who reads this language would so construe it, and there is no better interpreter of the English language than the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the question raised by the gentleman from New York, and I am going to tell one or two things that I saw during the vacation which, I think, have some pertinence and application here, and I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] how under such circumstances these features would be affected by the proposed legislation?

During the vacation, not being very much engaged in active politics—my Republican opponent having been put to sleep early [laughter]—I was invited to visit some of the schools in my home town of San Antonio. First I visited a negro school, one of the most efficient and best conducted schools that I ever saw in my life, an immensely better school than I ever had the privilege of attending in my youth, which was during that period in the history of the South when we had comparatively few and usually inefficient schools. This particular school was a public school of the city of San Antonio. One of the most important features of its work, perhaps the most important, was the teaching of what is called domestic science—cookery, and so forth, and I was served with a wonderfully fine luncheon cooked by the pupils—including dressmaking and things of that kind, and carpentering and blacksmithing. My information was that these things were taught by teachers who also taught other things.

In another school, the great central high school, I saw immense shops for carpenters and smiths, and they were making all the school furniture. They were doing all kinds of work like that, and doing it admirably; and so efficiently and rapidly did they do it that the superintendent of schools of the city told me that he had some doubt of the wisdom of the policy, because, he said, the boys became efficient so soon, and so very efficient, that their services were sought for in the industries of San Antonio, and that they were tempted to abandon their ordinary scholastic pursuits by the high wages offered.

Now, I would like to know of the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the committee, whether unless this fund, if it shall be appropriated, is turned over to the State educational authorities to be distributed in their judgment, the teachers engaged in teaching grammar, reading, writing, and things of that kind, who also are capable of teaching and engaging in the work of teaching other things provided for in this bill, will be cut off from any benefit from this fund? Will there be any doubt about the right to pay part of their salaries from this fund?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that, in my judgment, there will be no doubt. The bill provides that in order for a State to receive the money the State must provide for the plant.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have already provided these particular plants the gentleman apparently has in mind.

Mr. FESS. And the State board or other authority must provide for a minimum qualification of teachers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois upon that point, which were somewhat reassuring.

Mr. FESS. And third, they must provide also for expenditure that is to be fixed as a minimum, and all of this is to be submitted to the Federal board, and if the Federal board approves of it the money can go for that particular purpose. I see no reason at all why the case the gentleman speaks of is not covered by the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman appreciate the fact that vocational training is being very generally adopted and rapidly made a more important part of the school curriculum everywhere?

Mr. FESS. I have just looked through the vocational commission report. There are nine States that by law provide for vocational training, but there are cities upon cities that have done it without reference to the State authorities, so that if the gentleman would ask me how many cities or localities have taken it on, I could answer that they are very numerous, though there are only nine States that have done it by law.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know from personal observation that the country schools are doing it in Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, at the end of section 3, adding the following:
"That not more than 20 per cent of the money authorized to be appropriated under this act for the payment of salaries of teachers of trades, home economics, and industrial subjects for any year shall be expended for the salaries of teachers of home-economics subjects."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted, and I understand that it is acceptable to the members of the committee, not more than 20 per cent of the aid provided for in this section can be expended in the payment of salaries of teachers of home-economics subjects.

As the language in the bill now reads, without this limitation I am satisfied that a great many States would be able to receive all of the money provided for in this section without any new activities whatever upon the part of those States, and the whole purpose of the bill is to stimulate the States into doing those things which are not being done now, or, if done, not properly done, in order that they may provide a practical system of vocational education. This amendment will at least insure that 80 per cent of this fund will be used for subjects other than home economics subjects. I am a good deal in sympathy with the view of the gentleman from New York, Mr. PLATT, that home economics ought not to have been in the bill at all, so far as providing for the payment of the salaries of teachers is concerned.

Mr. FESS. It was not in the original bill.

Mr. LENROOT. It was not in the original bill, and it is not in the Senate bill for which this is a substitute. I say this not because I feel less interested in the subject of home economics than any other Member, but in my judgment the subject of home economics should be a part of the general educational system of the country. It ought to be a part of the curriculum of every school. Every girl, irrespective of what vocation she may ultimately follow, ought to be taught home economics, and the whole idea and object of this bill is to provide a vocational education. But it is in the bill, and I realize very well that many Members may not appreciate as I do or feel as I do concerning the incorporation of home economics in this bill. As I said a moment ago, this limitation of 20 per cent will at least insure 80 per cent of the fund to be used for new activities upon the part of the States, rather than merely an aid to the States in bearing the burdens they now bear and that they ought to bear.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a Congress met here at the beginning of the Civil War, a Congress that was confronted with some very difficult problems, which have probably not been equaled since then, and yet that Congress passed a law providing for the creation of agricultural and industrial colleges and making an appropriation amounting to $15,000 a year for each of the States for agricultural experiment stations. We carry now in the Agricultural appropriation bill every year, without opposition, an appropriation of more than $3,000,000 under the heading of States Relations Service, about half of which goes to the agricultural experiment stations to aid in education. I make profert of myself as evidence—not too proud of it—of what the agricultural colleges, the land-grant colleges, could do years ago. In the early days of those colleges I became a student at what is now called the University of Illinois, and went there partly because my father was interested in such subjects, and partly, I imagine, because there was little if any tuition fee. I believe they have done a great good. The appropriation in the course of these many years has been somewhat increased, and yet it is not exorbitant to-day. While the General Government makes some appropriation for this class of education, it has not assumed the entire burden. The great increase in the cost of the agricultural colleges, the land-grant colleges, has come from the people of the States through the State treasuries and not out of the General Treasury. We have reached that point where most of the States now prohibit children from doing anything but loafing or going to school. They are not permitted as we were, when we were young—not only permitted, but required—to work, and we can not go on without providing that the children shall have the opportunity of learning how to do things. It is not difficult in this country to learn how to think, but it is difficult to learn how to do. I sometimes think that if we had fewer thinkers and more doers we would be just as well off; but when we can add thinking and doing together, that is where we reach the summit of education. [Applause.] That is the theory of vocational education, and as the General Government in the sixties started with its land-grant college provisions the vocational idea of giving the farmer a training, so now through this bill it proposes to encourage the idea of giving the boy and the girl the right to learn how to do things while thinking as well.

I welcome the day when we shall engage upon this wonderful undertaking. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the enactment of this bill is in keeping with the progressive spirit of the age. Vocational training began on an extensive scale in this country in the schools some 20 years ago. It was difficult at that time to find a teacher who could teach vocational training. We have a State normal school in Kansas, located in Pittsburg, my home town, that trains over 1,000 teachers. There are over 1,000 students there now from Texas, from Vermont, from Maine, from California, from every State, almost, in the Union, taking vocational training, and they are trained to teach in the schools of the country—how to think and how to do at the same time. One school teaches girls not only how to find out how much three pounds of coffee will come to at 28 cents a pound, but teaches them how to make the coffee, which is just as important as to know how much it costs. It also teaches them how to take care of a sick baby and how to clean up a sick room. It teaches girls how to repair a chair, a sewing machine, or any piece of furniture in the house. It teaches the young men how to do things that will be necessary for them to do on the farm, as merchants, or mechanics. It teaches young men how to use their hands and their brains, so that they can become experts in the industries of the country. And, as stated here a moment ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], the difficulty is in keeping young men in the school long enough. They become so expert that the industries want them and want them at once, and they are taken out of the school before they have finished the course and before they have fully equipped themselves to become instructors. They get an offer of better wages than school-teachers are ordinarily given to go into some of the industries of the country because of the learning they have acquired in this vocational school. As teachers they get better salaries than other teachers. So, whatever this bill may be able to do to advance vocational training throughout the country will be for the great betterment of the people of the country in every vocation in life—farming, manufacturing, housekeeping, and every phase of life and every activity that administers to the comforts and happiness and prosperity of the people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Excuse me. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If I have any more time, I will yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]——

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, we are exceedingly anxious that this bill should be absolutely perfected, and it is of vital importance that we should do it this afternoon. I move now——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield to the gentleman to make his motion in the midst of my five minutes. I know the gentleman does not want to impose a cloture rule on the House?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is one of the most courteous gentlemen in the House and would not close anyone out from a fair time for debate. I understand that is the gentleman's position. No one has opposed the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I desire to discuss it, because if it is adopted it would appear, providing we were to deal only with the education of girls, that 20 per cent of the pupils would be taught home economics, which means the development and the preservation of the home, and 80 per cent would be left free to be given instruction as to how to work in the mills. Carried out literally, that is what it would mean.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the gentleman know that vocational education in commerce is as much for the benefit of the girls as for the boys, and is not the operation of mills to-day quite as much for commerce as manufacturing?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be; but I doubt if the gentleman wants to limit the education of girls to several branches of industry to the prejudice of their education in properly conducting a home. I have some feeling on this subject, because I come from a mill district. If I had my way, I would not permit a girl to work in a mill. [Applause.] If 80 per cent of the girls who are to be taught under this paragraph are to be taught industrial trades, I am certainly against the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin that only 20 per cent of them shall be taught the useful life and occupation of conducting a home.

Now, why this amendment is offered I do not know. The committee seems to have yielded upon this proposition for some reason or other. Many of the girls of this country are being weaned away from the home life, which they ought to learn to respect, and encouraged to go into the mills, factories, and foundries, if you please, for the purpose of competing with men.

The industrial schools in Philadelphia have an honorable history. One of the best of them was organized by private contributions, but was compelled to abandon its work largely because the students of that school could not obtain employment in the trades in which they became competent, because of union-labor regulations. And if we are to train girls to be mill workers, train them to compete with the men, take them away from the homes, make home life humiliating to them, why, then, perhaps, we had better adopt an amendment limiting the amount of teaching there shall be for those of our daughters whom we hope will be kept out of the mills, and who, contracting honorable marriages, may be able to manage a home rather than to depend upon somebody else in an apartment house or hotel to manage a home for them. I want to see the youth of this country properly educated on vocational lines. I want to see the boy master his job. I would like to see the housewife able to conduct the affairs of the home, and I would not confine her to the mill. Neither would I limit this public benefaction we are conferring upon the States, so that only 20 per cent of the young women would be able to manage a home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day I stated that there was a most unfortunate misapprehension upon the part of some Members of this House as to the purposes and objects of this bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has now revealed himself as being one of those Members who are under a total misapprehension of the purposes and objects of this bill. He does not seem to have gathered any of the principles that lie behind this bill.

Why, he talks of this amendment that I have proposed as proposing to educate only 20 per cent of the girls in home economics and compel 80 per cent of them to be educated for the mills. Why, if the gentleman would read this bill before he undertook to get up on the floor and debate it, he would furnish more information to the Members of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Apart from home ecomonics, which the gentleman would limit to 20 per cent, what else are these teachers to teach except trade and industrial subjects?

Mr. LENROOT. Trade and industrial subjects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all. Eighty per cent trade and industrial subjects and 20 per cent for domestic economics.

Mr. LENROOT. The purpose of this bill, as has been stated time and time again by Members on both sides on this floor, and the purpose revealed in the bill itself, if the gentleman will take the trouble to read it, is not that this money is to be used to furnish the education of these boys and girls, but to stimulate the States into doing for themselves what they ought to do; and this limitation is for this purpose: That where a State furnishes the home economic education, as my State is doing, and as I hope the gentleman's State is doing, there is no occasion for invoking aid from the Federal Government where the State is doing it for itself.

But let us see what the gentleman's position would lead him to. He desires no limitation. That means that every dollar provided by this bill could be drawn from the Treasury and used in a State for home economics alone. That would mean that in the State of Pennsylvania they could draw all this money for the purpose of educating girls alone in home economics and deprive the girls and boys of the gentleman's district in Philadelphia of the privilege of receiving a vocational education in training and industry.

The purpose of this amendment is to make this bill do that which it is intended to do—to stimulate the States into doing those things which the States either are not doing now at all or are not doing in such a way as to provide practical vocational training for the boys and girls of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the question of home economics was fully considered by the President's commission in three months' study, and our information was that home economics was being very well cared for in almost every State and in almost every city of the country. The question immediately arose that if you were to appropriate for that particular subject, every school would get a portion of it and there would certainly not be money to go to any one school large enough in its sum to amount to anything. Consequently the commission's report omitted it entirely. The Senate bill omitted it. Our original bill omitted it. But in our committee the matter was taken up and the argument was pretty strongly pressed that we ought to recognize home-economics teaching as well as home-economic training. The committee had already recognized the latter; that is, money paid to institutions for the training of teachers, but not for the payment of salaries of teachers teaching these subjects. So that home economics was placed in the House bill, and is in the bill now.

The committee, I think, would agree to allowing it to be limited to 20 per cent along the line of what has been suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], not because there is any opposition to home economics; furthest from it. There are 12,000,000 boys and girls between the ages of 14 and 16 that are in the agricultural field to-day. There are 12,660,000, to be exact. There are 14,250,000 that are in urban life; in the rural population a little less than in the urban population. There was no provision for home economics in the agricultural appropriation of $3,000,000. There is a provision for home economics in the trade and industrial lines.

Now, if we devote all of the $3,000,000 to agriculture, that will go to one class of our population engaged in one thing. If we devote the $3,000,000 to urban population, it will be divided among home economics and trade schools and industrial schools which are not equivalent to trade schools. We ought to make a distinction between those, and in that way it would seem to me that probably, unless we limit the amount for home economics, there might be some misfortune that we do not want admitted into the bill. Personally—and I think I can speak for the members of the committee—we would be willing to vote for a limitation upon the amount to go to this particular fund, and I shall vote for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a question.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the committee, I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering whether, from the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, he was endeavoring to impress the House with the fact that the expenditures under the authorization in this bill would be made in segregated institutions such as I described when I was talking on the bill.

Mr. FESS. That would have to be left entirely with your State board.

Mr. MADDEN. The only conclusion I could reach from what the gentleman said was that he believed in having special plants created for the teaching of special lines of instruction.

Mr. FESS. The bill provides that the State board must submit all plans, and must establish a plant by State expenditure, and that plan and plant must be approved by the Federal board.

Mr. HUGHES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One moment. There has been no action taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I do not think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] can pass an amendment by merely accepting it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 60, noes 7.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: Page 6, line 2, after the words "$50,000," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following:

"Provided, That the words 'industrial subjects' when used in this act shall include cooperative credit and business."

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate upon this amendment be limited to 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment be limited to 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Reserving the right to object, I have an amendment that I should like to offer, and to discuss for a few moments.

The CHAIRMAN. This request is as to the pending amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, judging from the fate which my amendment received this morning it is probable that this amendment will not carry, although I hope it will. This morning I was talking about the importance of cooperative credit among the farmers. Now, this section provides for the teaching of industrial subjects and the training of teachers to teach those subjects. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] seemed to think that my whole interest was in the farmers—that they should be provided with better credit—but that is not true. During the last few years we have been studying better credit facilities, especially for the farmers; and I wish to say that the European countries have also provided cooperative credit institutions for persons engaged in industrial pursuits, for small dealers, for small traders, for small merchants, while in this country we have made no progress in that direction. Now, take our banks as a whole, if I remember correctly they have invested and loaned out about $20,000,000,000. One-half of that entire amount is loaned to the corporations of this country. This does not mean that I am attacking the corporations, but it does mean that the advantages of credit in our banks are used to make money for the corporations. That fact has been recognized in Europe, and hence European countries have provided cooperative credit societies, not only for the corporations and for the owners of farms, but also for the persons of small means in the towns and cities. The history of those institutions shows that they have contributed immensely to the advantage and benefit of the poor. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to this matter. In the last few years, when we have been trying to provide better credit facilities for the farmers and the men who largely represent agricultural districts, what has been done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other man representing a great city constituency to provide better credit facilities for the poor men in the great cities of our country? In the great cities of Europe there are special institutions through which men can purchase homes on terms and at a rate of interest not duplicated here in the United States.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DALLINGER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if he is at all familiar with the work of the cooperative banks in Massachusetts and with the fact that thousands and tens of thousands of workmen have been able to obtain homes through them?

Mr. BENNET. Is the gentleman also familiar with the system in operation in New York by which a street car conductor can borrow the money to buy his uniform when he gets a job on a street car, and anybody else in a similar situation can do the same thing?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am somewhat familiar with what both these gentlemen call attention to, and yet I know that in our great cities as a whole the poor man is without credit facilities. Our banks are loaning their money to the great corporations and the great merchants, and the man of small means does not have access to credit facilities, as he does in Europe.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know that while we were giving $15,000,000 out of the Public Treasury to start farm-loan associations for the benefit of the farmer, we in the cities had already provided ourselves, out of our own funds, with building associations by which the workmen were obtaining homes in the cities?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The building and loan associations are doing a great work——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman would recognize that they were.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. But it is comparatively insignificant compared to the great field that is open.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that we in the cities are paying the farmer the highest prices he has ever received for all that he produces?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. I should like to know what bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania has presented——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The farmer is receiving now the highest prices for everything that he produces, from eggs to potatoes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am not now discussing the problems of the farmer. This amendment applies to cooperative credit for the millions in our great cities. There is a great field for the activities of both Federal and State authorities. In this bill we are appropriating many millions of dollars. We are entering a new field for the National Government. We should see to it that these funds are utilized in a way that will not only make the farmer and mechanic a larger producer of products in his line but will give both the farmer and mechanic greater profit on his labors. This will be done by promoting cooperation in business and credit among our farmers and wage earners throughout every section of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The debate is open to anyone who desires to oppose the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is the best friend of the Oklahoma farmer on this floor, with apologies, of course, to the other Representatives from Oklahoma. Next to them he takes the rag off the bush. He is for the farmer who is now "bleeding" because he can not get anything (?) for his cotton down in Oklahoma. The poor farmer down in Oklahoma, getting $100 a bale, is impoverished just now, because we do not give him a little more rural credit.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Wait a minute. My heart bleeds for the downtrodden farmer of Oklahoma. I have heard so much from my friend from Oklahoma that I feel I can sympathize with him from the very depths of my heart; but I want to tell the gentleman that we have been buying eggs lately up our way, and they have cost us as high as a dollar a dozen, and the farmer has been getting it, except the very little slice that the gentleman thinks goes to the middleman who builds the railroad to get the eggs up from Oklahoma, or from somewhere out in Kansas, so we can get them at a dollar a dozen in Philadelphia and New York.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Surely.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I want to ask what the gentleman has done in this Congress, we will say, in an effort to provide better facilities for the laboring men and the small business men of his State with better credit?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have tried hard to have a few canals built to improve transportation [laughter] in order that the laboring man might have work and the farmer facilities for getting his crops to the market, but at such times the gentleman from Oklahoma could not see anything but the Oklahoma farmer, who seems to keep himself within the confines of his own State. I want communication with Texas and with Oklahoma, and if we can not get it by rail I want it by water. I know if we get it by water we will keep hundreds and thousands of people employed in the transportation business, which is a middleman's business, so that the farmer can get higher prices for his cotton and eggs. [Laughter.] Why, a little talk of this kind is educational. This is an educational vocation bill, and the farmers, those who support this bill, want to limit the right of the teachers who are to be paid out of the Public Treasury to educate their children in home economics; they want them taught a higher form of college art—to trip the light fantastic toe, and let the mothers and fathers do the work. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly; any gentleman from Oklahoma is welcome now. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. I want to know if the gentleman in his generosity would bring his interoceanic canal to Oklahoma.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; if I could get in, but it takes all our money to help the gentleman from Oklahoma irrigate farms of 40 acres, at $7,500 per farm, whereas if we had a small proportion of the sum the gentleman gets for his semi-arid farms we could take care of most of his population in two counties in New Jersey.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not get my support for his interoceanic canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have always supported the gentleman in his arid-land schemes, and I observe the gentleman always takes the public money for that purpose and always does it in the name of the farmer, without regard to the fact that he is making the farmer pay the taxes; but the farmer is making so much money now that by and by the income tax will reach him as it reaches Carnegie and Rockefeller. From the reports I have here the farmers of the West are making barrels of money, while in the East we are paying European-war prices for everything we eat. The "downtrodden farmer" is buying his fine limousines, with which he goes to church and the moving-picture shows just now. He is having a most delightful time in the gentleman's country and my people are paying the bill. Sometimes when I get up and call attention to these facts the gentleman from Oklahoma rises and wants to know what we have done in the city to relieve the situation. We have at least tried to call attention to the fact that the farmer is getting it all. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out all of the section after the word "census," line 3, on page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York proposes an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 5, by striking out the proviso beginning after the word "census" down to and including line 2, on page 6.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. BENNET. I object. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the purpose of this proviso, it is to make it possible that States that do not earn the minimum under this bill by their own contribution, or who are not entitled to it by population, either rural or urban, shall nevertheless get the minimum sum. It strikes me that that is unfair. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] awhile ago started a very scholarly speech—and he was scholarly all the while he talked and some time he will conclude it—but he called attention to the change of situation that some day Congress must take into account. The wealthy States are now contributing all out of proportion to the population, and receiving from the National Treasury sometimes up to the proportion of their population but not always.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman realize that the prosperity of New York, the great metropolis, is founded not alone upon the local business of New York but the general prosperity of the country?

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Missouri has made the next sentence in my speech. I think I might have made it just as well. I agree with him. We are all one country, and Oklahoma can not prosper unless New York does, and New York can not prosper unless Oklahoma does. I recognize the propriety of taxing wealth, even though that wealth happens to be in the State which I in part represent.

But I am certain of this fact, not in connection with this particular bill so much, that if taxation continues to be ingeniously added to the wealth and spread out as little as possible over population there will come a time when the old spirit of our forefathers that rebelled against taxation without representation will rebel again—this time against unequal taxation. I do not object because States which contribute less are under this bill getting just as much per person for rural and urban education as is New York. It would be grotesque to insist that because New York happens to contribute six or eight times as much per capita as some States to the National Treasury her children in the rural communities should receive six times the per capita for education that the children of the other States do; but it does seem to me that the large contributing States have a legitimate objection to the provision that States which do not either by population or by their own contributions make themselves eligible to receive the sums stipulated in this bill, shall receive them, nevertheless, as a minimum, simply because Congress wants to give them to them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The principle upon which the minimum requirement is written is that if you do not make a contribution of a certain size it will be too small other than to be just frittered away. The rural population of Wyoming is two-tenths of 1 per cent of the rural population of the United States, and under the provision of allotment it would get about $1,050. The $1,050 appropriated to Wyoming for any purpose of education would be so small that it would be frittered away, and it ought to receive at least $5,000 or nothing. Its industrial population is only one-tenth of 1 per cent. There are 4 States which would be beneficiaries in industrial matters and 16 States in agricultural matters, and that is why that minimum provision was inserted.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this bill, on the whole, is so fairly drawn that the particular amounts mentioned in it really amount to very little. It was not to them especially that I was addressing myself; but, if I may use the phrase, I was indulging in a little bit of a look into the future. As my days here are numbered, I wish to leave my contribution toward the problem that those of you who will succeed me in the Sixty-fifth and other Congresses will have to face. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will have to face it, as will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and so on, in the large contributing States on which are being piled yearly and on which in this Congress will be piled additional burdens of taxation—not according to the population, but according to their wealth. They will, sooner or later, have to face a feeling among the constituencies which elect them that if a certain proportion of the taxation comes from their States, then a certain proportion of the moneys put out in this way ought to go back to those States. I do not think that feeling is entirely fair, but I think it is the part of proper statesmanship to recognize now that the danger of that feeling does exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. I think it is the part of proper statesmanship at the earliest moment when this new system of direct taxation is novel among us to be facing the problems that that system is going to bring about.

Right in connection with that I want to say a word or two about the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], who asked those of us from the city what we have done to enlarge the credit facilities of the people in the cities. We have not done anything in the Sixty-fourth Congress, because there is no place on the face of the footstool where the credit facilities of the poor man are better than in the large cities. We do not believe in creating Government enterprises to do that which is already well done by private enterprise. I will tell you what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] and I could do to-morrow morning, and he and I are possibly about the same age—both of us over 40. We could land in New York City to-morrow morning, and with not 1 cent in the world we could go to the Bowery Young Men's Christian Association, where we could be trusted in the beginning with more credit than we would be entitled to according to our visible wealth if we had no money. We could be trusted from the beginning for our food and shelter, and in addition that institution would undertake the contract of finding employment for us suitable to what we could do. I speak now of the case of the very poorest man. Supposing we got what we could get, a job on the elevated railroad or the subway, we could go to the Morris Plan Bank in New York City, and we could get the money to buy the uniform that would be necessary, and then go right back there to that Young Men's Christian Association in the Bowery, and they would continue to trust us, at least for our board and shelter, until the first pay day. If we were mechanics and had tools, we could make arrangements by which we could retain our tools, and the Provident Loan Association would loan us money upon the apparent credit caused by the fact that we had tools. If we were merchants in a small way and needed as small a sum as $50, there are at least a half dozen State banks in the city of New York, which under our State law have local branches in the different sections of the city which would be glad to loan us seventy-five or fifty or one hundred dollars to carry on our little business.

In a big city a man who has character and willingness to work and ability to work never has to complain of the lack of proper means of credit up to the amount of credit that he ought to have. That is the reason why we have not done anything in this Congress, and why the Representatives from the city will not do anything in the Sixty-fifth or the Sixty-sixth or the Sixty-seventh Congress or thereafter. The large cities have facilities such as I have described. Take the smaller towns in the States like Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and New York. Let us take the case of a brakeman on a railroad and let us suppose that he saves up $150. With that he can buy a lot in a city up to as large as 10,000 inhabitants, and with nothing in the world but that $150 lot and his job he can go to the building and loan association and borrow money at 5 per cent with which to build his entire house, and have 14 years in which to pay it back.

I have indicated only one place where the gentleman and I, if penniless, could nevertheless immediately obtain more credit than our financial condition really warranted.

There are many such. If we were Hebrews, we could go to the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society or the Young Men's Hebrew Association or the Hebrew Sheltering Home of Harlem.

Protestant Christians, as we are, we could nevertheless go to the Hebrew Free Loan Association and obtain a small loan, without interest, for the association makes loans to all creeds and races among the poor, and always without interest, because the law of Moses says (Exodus xxii: 25):

If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer; neither shalt thou lay upon him usury.

"Usury" is used here in the ancient sense and is synonymous with "interest." There is no place where credit for those who have character, but no assets, is so easy to obtain as in a large city. The feelings of those in smaller communities are as kindly, but their impulses are unorganized. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] seems surprised that the banks loan large sums principally to rich people. They do this because rich people can repay large loans and give good security. No sound system of banking has yet been devised by which large sums of money can be safely and profitably loaned to irresponsible people. But the poor man in a large city can borrow far more money than his financial standing alone would permit and far more than any properly conducted Government enterprise ought ever to be permitted to loan him.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of cooperating with the States in preparing teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects and teachers of trade and industrial and home economics subjects there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, for the use of the States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $700,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $900,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and annually thereafter, the sum of $1,000,000. Said sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States, not including outlying possessions, according to the last preceding United States census: Provided, That the allotment of funds to any State shall be not less than a minimum of $5,000 for any fiscal year prior to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, nor less than $10,000 for any fiscal year thereafter. And of the sums herein authorized to be appropriated the following sums, or so much thereof as may be needed, shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotment provided for in this section: For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $46,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $32,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $24,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and annually thereafter, the sum of $90,000.

Mr. POWERS and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. POWERS: On page 6, line 4, strike out the word "preparing" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors engaged in training."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill was reported last February. The committee intended to get together and run over any amendment which any member of the committee might want to offer, but we had no opportunity to do that. Since the report of the committee on this bill certain objections have reached me as to the word "preparing." Section 2 of the bill is predicated upon the theory of appropriating $3,000,000 a year after 1925 for the purpose of paying the salaries of teachers to teach agricultural subjects. Section 3 of the bill is predicated upon the theory of paying $3,000,000 annually after 1925 for the purpose of paying the salaries of teachers to teach trade and home economic subjects. Section 4 of the bill, the one to which I offer my amendment, is predicated upon a little bit different theory from either section 2 or section 3. Section 4 provides that the Federal Government shall expend $1,000,000 a year after the year 1920, I believe it is, for the purpose of paying the salaries of teachers to teach or to train people how to teach these various subjects—agriculture, home economics, and industrial subjects. The purpose of this bill is that the $1,000.000 shall be expended in paying the salaries of teachers to train other teachers to teach these subjects. The objection has been raised that if the word "preparing" is left in the bill the normal schools of the country will largely take over this entire fund. Now, there is no purpose on the part of the committee or any member of it to deprive the normal schools of their full share of this fund, but my amendment provides that this $1,000,000 a year shall go to paying the salaries of teachers in training these various folks to teach these various subjects. The word "prepare" means to equip, to fit out, to provide with whatever is appropriate and necessary; that covers more ground and includes many for which this money ought not to be expended. My amendment does not change the purposes of the bill as it has been framed by the committee, but it makes sure that this money shall be used for the purpose for which it was intended.

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES], the chairman of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the committee has carefully considered this bill line by line and section by section, and we have agreed that the word "preparing" is a proper one.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate upon this measure and am led to the conclusion that a Federal appropriation is a wonderfully efficacious thing to furnish stimulation to the States.

Now, the matter of education is a duty that either rests upon the State or it does not rest upon the State. If there is a demand that the youth of the land be educated along vocational lines that demand should be sufficient to force the States to take care of and provide that sort of education. If an appropriation such as this is justified, and if legislation of this sort is warranted, when coupled with an appropriation, then we here would be warranted in passing a bill saying to the States, "You shall furnish this education, although we make no appropriation therefor." And if there is need for this stimulation, I say, Congress ought to pass a law requiring every State within the Union to furnish this sort of legislation at their own expense, at least that is the way this scheme ought to be inaugurated.

Already nine States, we have been told, have embarked upon this program, and if nine States can do that, paying the expense out of their own treasury, why can not all States in the Union adopt that same program?

The proper way, I submit, for a project of this sort to be handled would be for the Nation to create and establish a national university or a series of universities which would be under distinct Federal control. But, it is said, we have embarked upon this policy in the road appropriation. Yes; we have, and I am credibly informed that one of the great enterprising States of the Middle West, through agitation in the newspapers, by the leading newspapers of that State, and by citizens interested in the subject within that State, will not probably undertake to cooperate with the Federal Government in the improvement of roads. And a spirit of resentment is going forth throughout that State because they realize it is an encroachment upon the powers and duties that belong distinctively to the Commonwealth, and such stimulation is not looked on with favor. And so I feel that I probably can not support this measure in this form. I believe that if nine States can do this without the wonderful stimulant of a Federal appropriation, the other States can see to it that they will do it. They say, "Oh, $1,500 will accomplish nothing for Wyoming; therefore we will make a minimum appropriation of $5,000." Yes; they sought to do that in the road bill by giving them a gratuity of $6,500, but after that bill came back to this body it was found that a change had been wrought in it. It was agreed to in the form in which it came here. There should at least be some equitable scheme devised whereby each State should receive its share, if it be justified, and that instead of stimulation with Federal funds we might well enact a compulsory statute minus the appropriation, which will in no certain terms bring the States to a realization of their duty in this respect. What a spectacle is presented when States will brazenly admit they neglect their duty in regard to educational matters, but are willing to fulfill them if Uncle Sam will help bear the expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That in order to secure the benefits of the appropriations provided for in sections 2, 3, and 4 of this act, any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State board, consisting of not less than three members, and having all necessary power to cooperate, as herein provided, with the Federal Board for Vocational Education in the administration of the provisions of this act. The State board of education, or other board having charge of the administration of public education in the State, or any State board having charge of the administration of any kind of vocational education in the State may, if the State so elect, be designated as the State board, for the purposes of this act.

Any State may accept the benefits of any one or more of the respective funds herein authorized to be appropriated, and it may defer the acceptance of the benefits of any one or more of such funds, and shall be required to meet only the conditions relative to the fund or funds the benefits of which it has accepted: Provided, That after June 30, 1918, no State shall receive any appropriation for salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects until it shall have taken advantage of at least the minimum amount appropriated for the training of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects, as provided for in this act, and that after said date no State shall receive any appropriation for the salaries of teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects until it shall have taken advantage of at least the minimum amount appropriated for the training of teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects, as provided for in this act.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 8, line 5, after the word "and," strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. I offered an amendment myself. I am a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] is also a member of the committee. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky later.

Mr. POWERS. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair was not aware of the fact that I offered my amendment awhile ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I will withdraw my amendment for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his amendment temporarily, and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. POWERS: Page 8, line 7, strike out the word "until" and substitute the word "unless," and on line 13 strike out the word "until" and substitute the word "unless."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that after June 30, 1920—I believe it has been so amended—"no State shall receive any appropriations for salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects until it shall have taken advantage at least of the minimum amount appropriated for the training of teachers." Now, that word "until" evidently ought to be "unless," and the same thing is true in the subsequent line 13.

If there is no opposition to it, I will say no more at this time and will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection whatever to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. POWERS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ABERCROMBIE: Page 7, line 12, after the word "designate" insert the words "the State department of education."

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, section 5 of the bill provides—

That in order to secure the benefits of the appropriations provided for in sections 2, 3, and 4 of this act, any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State board, consisting of not less than three members, and having all necessary power to cooperate, as herein provided, with the Federal board of vocational education in the administration of the provisions of this act.

In the State of Alabama and some other States there is no State board of education. The public-school system is under the direction and supervision of a State officer, designated as the "superintendent of education." There is some doubt as to whether the Legislature of Alabama under its constitution would have the power to comply with this requirement.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. With pleasure.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask my colleague whether the extension of the time from 1918 to 1920 would not overcome the very obstacle or trouble of which he complains?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, the extension of the time from 1918 to 1920 would remove this obstacle if it were certain that our legislature has the power under its constitution to create a State board of education. We had a State board of education at one time, provided for in the constitution of the State. As a substitute for that board our constitutional conventions of 1875 and 1901 created a State department of education, to be under the direction of a State officer, known as the "superintent of education."

I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in order that there may be no doubt that my State will be able to meet this requirement, and I trust that the committee will adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I got the full force of the amendment to line 12.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The amendment which I offer, Mr. Chairman, provides that after the word "designate," in line 12, page 7, section 5, the words "the State department of education" be inserted. If this amendment should be adopted, the section would read as follows: "Any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act and designate the State department of education, or create a State board consisting of not less than three members and having all necessary power," and so forth.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to meet the requirements of my friend from Alabama, but I think that changes entirely what the bill wants to do. We want to do this work through a State board. Now, in my own State we have not a State board of education, but we ought to have, and I feel that if Ohio will not meet the requirements by creating a State board of education, she will be honestly and worthily punished for not doing it, and I am speaking advisedly, because I know of the constitution in my State. I would like to keep the requirement that all of this fund must be apportioned and applied through the State board of education, and not through any particular individual who might be called the head of the State board.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Is it possible under your State constitution for your legislature to create a State board of education?

Mr. FESS. Without a doubt.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I am not certain that it is possible under our State constitution, in view of the fact that we at one time had a constitutional provision establishing a State board of education, for which we substituted a provision establishing a State department of education under the direction of a superintendent of education.

Mr. BORLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a question.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. What virtue is there in administration by a board greater than in administration by a State educational department or superintendent?

Mr. FESS. The work of education in a State is sufficiently important that there ought to be an organization with complete control of the educational work, and every State in the United States, with a very few exceptions, has a State board. Some of our States, however, have neglected to take on that particular phase of educational organization.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not a board a rather clumsy method of doing business?

Mr. FESS. No; not if it is a small board.

Mr. BORLAND. There is a tendency to create more boards than we really need. In fact, I very gravely doubt—and it is my one doubt about this bill—whether we need this Federal education board, and whether it would not be entirely better and more efficient and appropriate to have it managed by the Federal superintendent of education or Commissioner of Education.

Mr. FESS. I think the work is so very comprehensive that it ought to have a board of managers well equipped for this particular work.

Mr. BORLAND. It sounds very well to speak of a board of high-class men, but in my State we have found that we have more boards than we need, and that it results in a great deal of lost motion and lost efficiency; and I heard the governor elect of my State announce that he proposed to consolidate a large number of our State boards into fewer organizations and fewer hands, which struck me as being a very good reform.

Mr. FESS. That is all right, to centralize these duties.

Mr. KELLEY. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], if the amendment is inserted as stated after the word "designate," whether that would not preclude the designation of the State board where one already exists?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. No; because the following sentence states specifically that the State board, where it exists, may be designated.

Mr. KELLEY. Your amendment being put in after the word "designate," then how would it read? Please read that once more.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Beginning in line 11—

Any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act and designate the State department of education, or create a State board——

Mr. KELLEY. Or create a State board?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Yes. Further on it is provided that the State board of education or other board having charge of the administration of public education in the State, or any State board having charge of the administration of any kind of vocational education in the State, may, if the State so elects, be designated as the State board for the purposes of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask one or two questions with regard to this matter. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] whether under his constitution the State legislature had the right to create a board of education. Now, of course, it is a fact that boards of education and State educational departments are created in the constitutions of some States, and it would be impossible to change the department without changing the constitution.

Mr. FESS. It is not intended to change the department. It just adds one thing.

Mr. PLATT. If the State constitution creates an educational department, there would be no opportunity to create a board of education without changing the constitution.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. That is exactly the trouble in Alabama, and in that connection I desire to read a telegram which I received a few days ago from Hon. William F. Feagin, the State superintendent of education for Alabama. It reads as follows:

Before passing vocational bill see that proper amendment makes it possible for Alabama to get benefit immediately, as you know our legislature does not meet until 1919, and the constitution of the State does not allow a State board of education.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accept the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will withdraw his request for a moment, after this section is perfected I propose to make a motion to strike out the section, and I want five minutes on the motion to strike out.

Mr. HUGHES. Then make it 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. My motion would not be in order until the others are disposed of.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I have one or two other amendments that I desire to offer to this section.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I withdraw my request.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Amend section 5 as follows: Add to the conclusion of line 16, on page 8, the following: "Provided, That until the final adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature held after the passage of this act, the assent of the governor of the State shall be sufficient, and until that time the governor of such State may designate the agency to cooperate with the Federal board of vocational education under the provisions of this act."

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, in a number of the States, my own being among them, the legislatures will not meet again in regular session until 1919. This amendment is offered for the purpose of making it possible for such States to participate in the distribution of these funds prior to that time without the necessity for special sessions of their legislatures. I might say that the first part of the proposed amendment is expressed in the exact language used in a similar amendment to the Federal roads bill. As Members will recall, that bill provided for acceptance through the State legislatures, but in order to render it possible for States to share in that fund prior to the regular meetings of their legislatures the bill was amended after this fashion.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Does not the change of dates in the bill as we have amended it meet the requirements of the gentleman's State?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Only in part. Under the terms of the bill there is no way for a State to participate in the use of any of the funds until its legislature has accepted and designated the agency to cooperate with the Federal board for vocational education.

Mr. FESS. Does my friend believe that it is wise legislation to make a provision that this must be accepted by the legislative action and then make an exception to it?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The proposed exception is temporary. It is to continue only until the legislature has had an opportunity to act. I submit that it would be unfair to compel a State to call a special session of its legislature, which would probably cost more than the State's first annual allotment, or forego for a period of two years the benefits to be derived by acceptance.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, Congress can not grant authority to the governor of any State to accept the provisions of any act.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I am not sure about that. Congress granted such authority to governors in the act providing Federal aid to the States for improving and constructing public roads.

Mr. LENROOT. Whether it did or not, Congress has no authority to grant authority to the governor of a State to bind the State. Is not that true?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, there is precedent for such action by Congress, and it occurs to me that the need, in this instance, is as great as it was in the good-roads legislation. Is haste in the construction of public highways of greater importance than promptness in the vocational training of our boys and girls who are growing into manhood and womanhood by the thousands day by day?

Mr. LENROOT. It must be granted, of course, that Congress can not authorize the governor of a State to bind the State, and then I want to ask by what authority the governor, in the absence of legislative authority, can bind the State?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. That raises a constitutional question that I am not prepared to answer. If the granting temporarily of such authority is unconstitutional, it is a matter that has been overlooked heretofore in other legislation, notably the act providing Federal aid to roads.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think my friend from Alabama will insist on that amendment. Of course the very object of the bill is to submit to the people of a State through its legislature the question of whether they will accept the provisions of the act and give power to the governor to accept the various provisions of the act. To give the power to the governor would be an utter subversion of the purposes of the bill. I do not know whether he would have the constitutional right to act upon it, but I am very sure that he would not have the authority to bind the State. The legislature could repudiate his action if it desired. I think it would involve the bill in very grave embarrassment, and I hope the gentleman will not insist.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. Mr. Chairman, this is the section which provides that before the States can obtain the benefits of this act they shall severally appropriate an amount equal to the amount to be allotted under the rules and regulations to be laid down. I do not believe in that character of legislation. I recognize the Federal Government as one sovereign entity, and I recognize the several State governments as sovereign entities.

I do not believe that the Federal Government ought to make an appropriation from the Federal Treasury to be expended in a State for any purpose and place upon it a limitation that it shall not be expended in that State unless the State itself responds in an equal amount.

Gentlemen say that this bill is not designed to destroy the autonomy of the States. It is not upon its face. And yet, what is the situation? The Federal Government, under the terms of this bill, will say to a State—well, say the State of Illinois, for example—"Here is $10,000, provided you tax yourselves in an equal amount. I have already taxed you to obtain this $10,000, which we now come and offer to you provided you tax yourselves again to raise an equal amount."

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is on the wrong section. Section 8 is what he talks about, but we are on section 5.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I will let my remarks apply to section 8 when we get to it, and I will complete my speech. If the State of Illinois says, "No; we do not choose to tax ourselves $10,000," then the Federal Government will say, "Very well; give us $1,000 and we will take that and distribute it among other States." The State of Illinois will obtain nothing under the provisions of this act unless it taxes itself in an equal amount, and yet gentlemen say that it does not propose to coerce the State. It is proposed, just as was in the roads bill, to coerce the State through the most powerful instrumentality of coercion that now exists in this country, and that is through the use of the taxing power.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that that principle ought to apply in legislation. I repeat what I said earlier in the day if the Federal vocational bill is essential, let it be a Federal vocational education bill, and let us not undertake——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that the Federal Government would have the right to impose a vocational education bill on the people of a State?

Mr. GARRETT. I doubt that very much; but the State might be willing to submit to that imposition. As a legal proposition it might not have the right. But I do undertake to say that it is bad policy to enter into this arrangement whereby you practically coerce a State to send one dollar after another, or are you proceeding on the principle, "For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath"? Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNER. Will not the gentleman withdraw his amendment to section 5?

Mr. GARRETT. I think in the proviso, if I interpret the language correctly——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is in section 8 that the requisite for State action is made.

Mr. GARRETT. It would be absolutely necessary if section 8 goes out that this section shall go out also, would it not be?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not. Of course, if the gentleman desires to insist upon his amendment, well and good.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That a Federal board for vocational education is hereby created, to consist of the United States Commissioner of Education, who shall be chairman of the said board, and four associate members, no more than two of whom shall be of any one political party, to be appointed by the President. In the first instance two members shall be appointed for two years and two for four years, and all subsequent appointments shall be for four years. The associate members of the board shall each receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. The board shall have power to cooperate with State boards in carrying out the provisions of this act. It shall be the duty of the Federal board for vocational education to make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports, with particular reference to their use in aiding the States in the establishment of vocational schools and classes and in giving instruction in agriculture, trades and industries, commerce and commercial pursuits, and home economics. Such studies, investigations, and reports shall include agriculture and agricultural processes and requirements upon agricultural workers, trades, industries, and apprenticeships, trade and industrial requirements upon industrial workers, and classification of industrial processes and pursuits, commerce and commercial pursuits and requirements upon commercial workers, home management, domestic science, and the study of related facts and principles, and problems of administration of vocational schools and of courses of study and instruction in vocational subjects.

Such studies, investigations, and reports concerning agriculture, for the purposes of agricultural education, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Agriculture; such studies, investigations, and reports concerning trades and industries, for the purposes of trade and industrial education, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Labor; such studies, investigations, and reports concerning commerce and commercial pursuits, for the purposes of commercial education, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Commerce; such studies, investigations, and reports concerning the administration of vocational schools, courses of study and instruction in vocational subjects, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Bureau of Education.

The Commissioner of Education may make such recommendations to the board relative to the administration of this act as he may from time to time deem advisable. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to carry out the rules, regulations, and decisions which the board may adopt. The Federal board for vocational education shall have power to employ such assistants as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. POWERS rose.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if we can not agree on some time in which to discuss this section? It is growing late, and we are very anxious indeed to complete this bill this afternoon.

Mr. POWERS. I shall only consume a very little time myself.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to agree upon some time in order that we may expedite the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that this is really the only controverted section in the bill. I would not like to see the time limited at this time. I have several amendments that I desire to offer.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that it is possible to complete the bill to-night, much as I would like to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that we go on and take an amendment at a time.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. POWERS: Amend section 6, page 8, by striking out all of lines 17 to 25, inclusive, on page 8, and the words "per annum," on page 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 6. That a Federal board for vocational education is hereby created to consist of the United States Commissioner of Education and four citizens of the United States, to be appointed by the President; one of said four citizens shall be a representative of manufacturing interest, one a representative of commercial interest other than manufacturing, one a representative of labor, and one a representative of agriculture. The board shall elect annually one of its members as chairman. In the first instance two members shall be appointed for two years, and two for four years, and all subsequent appointments shall be for four years. The members of the board, other than the United States Commissioner of Education, shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the pending Smith-Hughes bill, providing for national aid to vocational education, has been heralded far and wide as a Democratic measure. Vocational education as defined in the bill means that kind of practical education which is designed to prepare girls and boys for useful employment or occupation. Its purpose is to prepare workers for the more common occupations in which the great mass of our people find useful employment. The bill will soon become a law, and in the next political campaign it will be proudly spoken of by Democratic orators as one of the great achievements of the Democratic Party, and especially of this administration.

One not conversant with the facts would be led to believe that the Democratic Party is the grandfather of vocational education and the great-grandfather of national aid to same, and but for its wise statesmanship the world would never have had the slightest conception of what vocational education really means to the individual or to the Nation, whether procured through national aid or otherwise. No Republican will be given any credit for having had anything to do in helping to bring vocational education about, and especially national aid therefor; for was it not President Wilson who said in his Indianapolis speech that the Republican Party had not had a new idea in the last 30 years? Under the circumstances a brief review of the efforts to secure national aid for vocational education in this country will not be amiss. Let me say now that the real worth of vocational education to the individual and to the Nation, and especially national aid therefor, so far as this country is concerned, was largely conceived in Republican brains and pushed forward by Republican hands. In 1862 Justin S. Morrill, then a Representative from the State of Vermont and later a Republican United States Senator from the same Commonwealth, introduced and secured the passage of what has since become known as the Morrill Agricultural College Act. He believed that the welfare of the country demanded special education along the lines of agriculture and the mechanic arts. The original Morrill bill was vetoed by a Democratic President, James Buchanan, on the ground that education in all its forms was purely a State and local problem. He feared Federal aid would "cause the States to lean upon the National Government for the support of their own educational systems," as he expressed it in his veto. Abraham Lincoln, however, in 1862 signed the Morrill Agricultural College Act, which granted to the various States tracts of land on which to erect great agricultural and mechanical colleges for the purpose of training young men of college grade to become leaders in the great fields of agriculture and industry; and thus was established the policy of Federal aid to vocational education in this country.

OTHER LAWS FOLLOWED.

In the wake of this measure, which founded the agricultural and mechanical colleges, have come a series of congressional acts appropriating large sums of money and giving grants in furthering its purposes. Among these acts was one, in 1890, by Mr. Morrill himself. In 1887 Representative Hatch succeeded in passing through Congress a bill, since known as the Hatch Act, which provided an annual appropriation of $15,000 to each State for the maintenance of an agricultural experiment station. Subsequently this was increased to $30,000 per year. Other acts followed. Now an annual Federal appropriation of $80,000 goes to each of the 48 States in the Union for the support of their agricultural and mechanical colleges and experiment stations. The Smith-Lever Act of 1913 commences with an annual appropriation of $10,000 to each State for agricultural extension work, and this sum is increased from year to year until it finally reaches the average sum of $95,000 to each State. Effective farm extension work is now carried on in not more than one-third of the counties in the United States, and probably less than one-fifth of the farmers have been reached at all. Only a few thousand of the farm women have been reached by extension work in household arts. Including the agricultural college in Porto Rico and the one in Honolulu, Hawaii, both of which this Government helps to support, there are now 52 white and 17 colored in all. They receive an annual cash appropriation of over $4,000,000. The entire appropriation for their support has now reached the enormous sum of $46,000,000, and this does not include the 15,000,000 acres of land which have been given for the benefit of our State universities and agricultural and mechanical colleges. I am speaking, of course, of Federal appropriations.

The several States have appropriated about fourteen times this amount; some put these figures less. Each of the 48 States in the Union has a great agricultural and mechanical college or university. Many of them owe their existence and all of them the great good they have done in large measure to the grants they have received from the Federal Government. The official reports of the 50 white agricultural and mechanical colleges and universities to the Bureau of Education for the year ending June 30, 1910, show that they had enrolled in that year 56,834 students. The Morrill Act and those following it have given to this country these high-grade colleges, whose thousands of highly skilled and essentially specialized graduates have added untold value not only to the so-called cultural side of education but also to our agricultural and industrial development. Nobody questions the great good that has been done. But great as has been the results flowing from the Morrill Act, still the good confidently hoped for by its author has not been realized. He believed that his bill would furnish to the country a great army of trained farmers; that the college student would return to the farm to invigorate farm life by greatly improved farm methods. This was his hope and his dream. Instead of its fruition, the colleges have turned out technicians in agriculture and the mechanic arts, and but few of these in comparison with the number of students attending these colleges and universities. Of the 56,834 students enrolled in these agricultural colleges and universities for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, only 6,587 were agricultural students. The others were taking courses in English, history, mathematics, physics, and other sciences. Great as has been the results of the Morrill Act, it has failed to carry vocational education to the great masses of our people.

As I say, nobody denies its great achievements, but it has failed to send the farmer college boy back to the farm imbued with an enthusiasm for either agriculture or the industries or even their great possibilities.

OTHER REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TOOK A HAND.

Other Republican Members of Congress took up the task of extending national aid for vocational education so as to reach and better prepare for their labors, the man on the farm, the laborer in the mine, the housewife with her arduous household duties, the girl in the factory giving her young life to labors most uncongenial to her. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], now a distinguished Republican Member of this body, introduced a number of bills along these lines and devoted years of his life in pushing the cause along. The brilliant Senator Dolliver from Iowa, the sturdy and gifted Senators from Nebraska, Burkett and Pollard, Republicans all, introduced bills and furthered the cause for national aid to vocational education along useful and practical lines. The struggle went on. Other champions appeared upon the scene. Realizing that supplemental legislation was needed to the Morrill and allied acts, if the great mass of our people were to be reached and prepared for useful occupation in agriculture, industry, and home economics, Senator CARROLL S. PAGE, also a Republican United States Senator from the State of Vermont, began and for years has been giving the best efforts of his life to the solution of this great question. He fought hard to pass through the United States Senate a measure for Federal aid, which has since become known as the Page vocational education bill.

The proverbial uncertainty of American politics swept into the United States Senate a Democratic majority on March 4, 1913; and Senator HOKE SMITH of Georgia, became chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor. Senator PAGE took his place in the ranks.

The substance of the Page bill was introduced by Senator SMITH, as the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, following the report of a commission to investigate the question, and the measure then became the Smith bill. But let it ever be said to the credit of Senator SMITH that he has not tried to deprive Senator PAGE and other Republicans of the honor of fathering this great legislation. In a speech in the United States Senate on the 31st day of July, 1916, Senator SMITH, in speaking of the services of Senator PAGE, said:

> The responsibility for the measure would have continued with him rather than to have fallen to me but for the change which took place in the organization of the Senate three years ago. With the Republican majority he was leading in the work and I was helping him. Since that time, as I am chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, the situation is reversed just a little, but I am always glad to stop at any time the opportunity is presented to give to the Senator from Vermont every possible credit for his splendid work upon this subject and almost to regret that we have a Democratic majority and that he has not charge of the bill instead of myself.

The present distinguished chairman of the Educational Committee of the House, Mr. HUGHES, introduced a bill for vocational aid along the lines of the Smith bill, and the joint measure is now referred to as the Smith-Hughes bill. Every Republican on the Committee on Education, of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] is chairman, is giving this bill his enthusiastic support. Just a few moments ago the brilliant and able Republican leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], made a masterly speech favoring this bill. The Republicans, in the main, are friends and champions of the cause. This, then, in brief, is the history of this soon-to-be legislation, and like other legislation conceived in Republican brains, has been taken over by this Democratic administration and heralded to the country as its very own.

WHAT THE PURPOSES OF THE BILL ARE.

What then in substance is the legislation for which Senator PAGE and other Republicans stood? What is the legislation proposed in the Smith-Hughes bill? What is vocational education as herein advocated and for which national aid is now proposed? What need is it intended to fit and fill that other education fails to reach? Why can we not depend and why do we not depend upon our great colleges, universities, and our splendid system of public schools for all the education of every character that we need? It should be remembered that we have more than 600 colleges and universities in the United States. The running expenses of our public schools now cost in round numbers $600,000,000 every year. There are now, in round numbers, 30,000,000 children in this country between the ages of 6 and 20 years inclusive. About 50 per cent of these are urban or city children, 50 per cent live in the country. The history of education in this country shows that 40 per cent of these 30,000,000 children, or 12,000,000 of them, will have left school at the age of 14 years; 70 per cent, or 21,000,000 of them, will have left school by the time they are 15 years of age; and 85 per cent, or 25,5000,000 of them, will have left school by the time they are 16 years of age, although every State in the Union, with the exception of six, have laws compelling parents to send their children to school. Less than 10 per cent of the 30,000,000 children will ever go through high school, and of those that do go through high school less than 2 per cent will graduate from a college or university. Only half the children who enter the city elementary schools of the country remain to the final elementary grade. One million of them go out every year to join the great army of workers. They fill the vacant places caused by old age and death. At a pitifully young and inexperienced period of life they go out to face the cold, hard, sordid business world. They struggle through painful years of small wage and poor product.

If it should be said that these figures and these results are a pretty severe arraignment of the efficiency of our public-school system to reach the mass of our people, I shall have to admit that it is. If it should be said that 93 per cent—some put the figures as high as that—of our children should not stop school before they are 16 years of age, I readily agree that that is true. But the fact remains that they do stop. The fact remains that they leave school with inadequate general education and with no special education to fit them for life's work. The problems, then, confronting us are, What can we do to keep the children in school longer than they have been accustomed to go? What can we do for them while yet in school to better prepare them to meet the actual problems of life when they do go out? What can we do for those that have already gone and those that will go without that character of training that fits them to face without too great a disadvantage the real work of life before them? What can we do for our older and more mature people, male and female, now actually engaged in the real battle of life and many of them hard pressed by its stern necessities? That our present system of education is not measuring up to the real needs of the hour, nobody doubts or denies. That the courses of study in our present school system, collegiate, secondary, and common, are not sufficiently attractive and practical to keep the children and youths of our land, at ages frightfully young, from either going into idleness or the work of the world is proven by the painful truth that 85 per cent of the children leave school before they are 16 years of age and less than 2 per cent graduate from a college or university.

That the courses of study in our present school system are not practical enough and fail to connect, as they should, education with life, is abundantly proven by the all-to-many educated good-for-nothings and misfits in life. Our system of education ought to prepare people for the practical affairs of life and make them self-sustaining. Our theory of education and courses of study are predicated too largely upon the idea of preparing people for the professions.

WHERE THE BULK OF OUR PEOPLE WORK.

According to the census of 1910 there were 12,659,203 persons in the United States, both male and female, engaged in farming. There were 14,261,376 persons engaged in manufacturing, mechanical pursuits, and allied industries. Probably less than 1 per cent of those engaged in agriculture have had adequate preparation for so doing. This means, then, that there are over 12,000,000 people engaged in farming in the United States who have not been trained to deal with the soil through scientific methods in such a way as to make it yield what it should to the support of the present and future life of this Nation. It is equally correct to say that there is not 1 in 100 of the workers engaged in industrial pursuits that have had adequate training for the work in which they are engaged. A remedy ought to be found for this condition. Since less than 2 per cent of our children—largely the future citizens of our country—go through a college or university, and therefore less than 2 per cent of them are directly benefited by Federal grants to our agricultural and mechanical colleges, some way ought to be devised to reach and aid the other 98 per cent. That is partly the purpose of the bill before us. We must not be too sorely disappointed, though, if it fails to accomplish the object intended. It is a big problem we are tackling, and many there are who believe that we are not ready for Federal aid as provided for in this bill. Others believe that it is essentially a State and local problem and that the Government ought not to interfere. Others say that the courses of study in our schools should be modified so as to more adequately prepare people for the ordinary affairs of life, and that the reformation of our school system should come from within rather than from without.

I agree that there is much force of reasoning in the statement that the needed reform in our school system should come from within; and but for the conditions confronting us, as well as the imperative necessity for more practical training of the 25,000,000 workers now engaged in farming, mining, manufacturing, and the other occupations, as well as the other 1,000,000 workers that join the ranks of labor every year, I would be willing to let the States and local communities work out their own educational problems. But when we realize the great waste there is going on along agricultural lines—for example, the misdirected effort, the lack of proper yields from the soil, the high prices of all we consume, at least partly due to these things—we are bound to come to the conclusion that something ought to be done.

THE BILL PROVIDES FOR AGRICULTURAL TRAINING.

Among other things, the bill before us offers Federal aid to each State, first, in the teaching and preparing teachers to teach agricultural subjects; second, in the teaching and preparing teachers to teach home economics, trade, and industrial subjects. I shall speak first of the proposed Federal grant to aid the States along agricultural lines.

Section 2 of the bill provides "that for the purpose of cooperating with the States in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects" there is hereby authorized to be appropriated certain sums of money to the States each year till June 30, 1925, when it reaches the sum of $3,000,000. Each year thereafter it is to be that sum. The sum allotted to each State will be in the proportion that its rural population bears to the entire rural population of the United States. Kentucky would be entitled, under this arrangement, to $105,300 each year from the Federal Government. But before Kentucky or any other State would be permitted to share in these funds the State would have to match dollar for dollar with the Federal Government under the plans and arrangements provided for in the bill.

The instruction to be given must be under public supervision and control and "the controlling purpose of such education shall be to fit for useful employment; that such education shall be of less than college grade and be designed to meet the needs of persons over 14 years of age who have entered upon the work of the farm or the farm home." The bill provides that the schools in which any of the Federal money is to be expended "shall provide for directed or supervised practice in agriculture, either on a farm provided for by the school or other farm for at least six months per year." The bill also provides for the expenditure on the part of the Federal Government of $1,000,000 each year (the State putting up dollar for dollar) for the purpose of paying the salaries of teachers to train teachers to teach agricultural, trade, and home economic subjects.

THE IMPERATIVE NEED OF INTENSIVE AND SCIENTIFIC FARMING.

In order to support the present and future life of this Nation and make farming pay as it should, our farmers need to know more about the soils, orcharding, dairying, poultry raising, truck gardening, horticulture, bee culture, stock raising, stock breeding, rotation of crops, the testing of seeds, drainage, the chemical properties and value of fertilizers, and divers other things. I was reared on a farm and have at least a limited knowledge of the needs of the farmer. The demands upon our country for food products are such as to make more intensive and more progressive farming an absolute necessity.

For years the drift of our population has been from the country to the city. According to the United States census of 1880, 70.5 per cent of our people lived in the country, while 29.5 per cent lived in the cities and towns. The 1890 census showed that 63.9 per cent lived in the country while 36.1 per cent lived in the cities and towns. The 1900 census shows that 59.5 per cent lived in the country and 40.5 per cent lived in the cities and towns. The 1910 census shows that 53.7 per cent, or about 49,000,000, of our people are rural, while 46.3 per cent, or about 42,000,000, are urban or city.

In other words, we have just about as many people living in the cities and towns over 2,500 population as we do living in the country. By counting those who live in towns and villages under 2,500 in number we now have a greater urban than we have a rural population. The statistics I have cited show that people are constantly leaving the country and going to the cities and towns to live. Those who live in the cities, those who live in the mines, shops, and factories, and those who do not produce foods must be fed by those who do. In some sections of our country there is a good deal less land under cultivation today than there were 50 years ago. For example, the New England States had 72 per cent less land in cultivation in 1910 than they had in 1850. In certain agricultural sections, too, our rural population is decreasing. Iowa, the greatest agricultural State in the Union, 98 per cent of her land being capable of cultivation, has 4 per cent less population now than she had 10 years ago. In one-sixth of the total land area of the United States our population decreased during the years 1900 to 1910. In that decade our population decreased in 769 counties out of the 2,841 counties in the United States. The decrease covered an area of 472,462 square miles, 42,937 square miles of which were in the State of Missouri. The decrease in the State of Ohio amounted to 43.5 per cent. During the decade from 1900 to 1910 our urban population increased by 11,013,738, or 34.8 per cent; the total increase in our rural population was only 4,963,953, or 11.2 per cent. Our population is increasing at an enormous rate, but that increase is in the cities and towns, not the country. In the past there has been too much drudgery in farm life. Its profits have been comparatively small, its inconveniences many. The tendency has been—and naturally so—for too many of our industrious, progressive, and enterprising young men and women to leave the farm and seek more profitable and sometimes more congenial employment in the cities and towns.

Farm life will have to be made as pleasant and profitable as that found elsewhere in order to attract to it the young men and women of to-day. There is a big temptation for far too many to seek the bright lights of the city. The United States has been blessed with an immense acreage of virgin soil. That condition no longer obtains. Unscientific agriculture can not be profitably carried on except on a virgin soil and under conditions which permit of extensive culture. It is therefore indispensable that our farming be more intensive, more scientific, and more profitable, if we are to sustain our ever-increasing population, which to-day exceeds 100,000,000. One of the scientific staff of our Federal Bureau of Soils recently made this statement:

If the possibilities of increased profit are not a sufficient inducement to undertake the training of our farmers, certainly in the immediate future the exigencies of the increasing population will force upon our public authorities the responsibility for making our agriculture adequate.

It is estimated by the Bureau of the Census, as well as by the Department of Agriculture, that "within the lifetime of children now entering our public schools the population of the United States will be no less than 450,000,000." We know this is not an extravagant prediction when we stop to realize that our population increased from a little over 7,000,000 in 1810 to over 91,000,000 in 1910.

It is the part of wisdom and statesmanship to look out for the future. Aside from conserving our human resources, the conservation of our natural resources, "of which the fertility of the soil is the most important," is our most important social duty. Our soil must be made to yield more each year without impairment. This can not be done with our present careless method of agriculture, nor can we continue our present method of agriculture without the food supply becoming relatively less from year to year.

The pressure of population upon our food resources will increase not merely for a few years but for all time to come. It will be constant and more insistent as the years go by. It is vitally essential that there be established in general practice a restorative and permanent system of soil culture. This agricultural education should not only reach the mature farmer of to-day through agriculture extension work and otherwise, but it is even more essential that the youths of our land be prepared and thoroughly instructed in the right theory and practice of farm work. This practice and training must not be merely State; it must be Nation wide in its scope. Our agriculture must be highly productive. It must be permanent. Science has taught other countries how to restore and maintain the fertility of their soil and increase its productivity. Germany, for example, has within the last 30 years increased her production of rye from 15 to 29 bushels per acre. Within the same period the United States increased her production of rye from only 14 to 16 bushels per acre. Germany increased her production of barley from 24 to 29 bushels per acre; the United States from 24 to 24.3. Germany increased her production of wheat from 19 to 30 bushels per acre; the United States from 13 to 15 bushels. Germany increased her production of oats from 31 to 59 bushels per acre; the United States from 28 to 30. Germany increased her production of potatoes from 115 to 208 bushels per acre; the United States from 98 to 100 bushels.

Senator PAGE, in a great speech before the Senate in July of last year, said:

Mr. President, Germany has an area equal only to the three States of Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri, but she produced three-fifths as much oats, four-fifths as much barley, three times as much sugar, six times as many potatoes, and nine times as much rye as we produced in the whole United States.

Germany had, in 1907, 43,000,000 acres sowed in wheat, barley, oats, and potatoes. She harvested 3,000,000,000 bushels. We had in the United States the same year 88,500,000 acres in the same crops and harvested only 1,875,000,000 bushels. Germany had less than half the acreage and harvested nearly double the same number of bushels. Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota are our three greatest wheat-producing States. France is about the same size as these three States. France sowed, in 1907, 16,000,000 acres in wheat. The States of Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota did the same. In that year France harvested from her 16,000,000 acres 325,000,000 bushels of wheat. Kansas, Minnesota, and North Dakota harvested from the same number of acres only 188,000,000 bushels. They have 45,000 agricultural schools in France. France is the greatest producing nation in the world to-day. Germany, France, England, and some other countries produce from two to three times more of all sorts of products per acre than we do, and yet they have no better soil and no better climate. Science must do for us what it has done for these other countries. We have got to have better soil doctors in this country. We are compelled to give more attention to rotation of crops, fertilization, better seeds, and better breeds of stock. An expert in agricultural matters has recently said:

The nineteenth century farmer was no farmer at all; he was a miner, mining the fertility of the soil and selling it for the bare cost of mining.

He might have truthfully added that in too many cases the farmer does not raise anything to sell at all, but merely produces enough on which to live. I know that there are no better people than the ones I have the honor to represent.

I know that with our present methods of agriculture the problem of producing enough on which to live and laying a little something aside for a rainy day is a serious one. My district, too, has some 8,000 people engaged in mining. These people must be fed. The people living in the cities and towns must be fed. It would be infinitely better for all concerned if we could produce in our own district enough to support our own people.

In order to do this we will be compelled to make a study of our soil. We have got to find out whether it lacks in potash, phosphate, nitrogen, or other things, and then apply the remedy. We have got to quit putting the same piece of land in the same crop so often. We have got to find out what a certain piece of land is best adapted to produce and the best way in which to produce it.

Dr. Hopkins, of Illinois, one of the greatest soil chemists in America, was once lecturing down in the southern part of Illinois, near Egypt, where the land is poor. He explained to the farmers in that section how, by the application of $1.50 worth of phosphate to the acre, the normal yield of corn would be increased from 12 to 13 bushels per acre to 50 or 60. At the conclusion of his lecture a gray-haired old farmer, with tears in his eyes, stepped up to him and said:

Mr. Hopkins, I want to thank you for what I have seen to-day, but, God help me, if I only knew that thing 40 years ago. I have got six boys in my family, and I have labored night and day to keep body and breeches together and to keep the family together, and what have I got on my farm? Twelve to fifteen and sixteen bushels of corn to the acre is all that I could make. Now, I would like to have sent my boys to college; I would like to have given those children an education; but I could not raise enough crops on that piece of land that I have owned, and so I have tilled all my lifetime and have earned barely enough to support my family. Now, if a man had only come to me when I was a comparatively young man and told me the thing that you have told me to-day—that $1.50 of rock phosphate would have given me the 50 bushels of corn crop, the crop which was raised right over the fence from where I am—I could have sent my children to the high school and to a university, and—

He said, with tears running down his face—

I am at the end, and nobody told me that.

Too many good men have grown gray and worn their lives out as the old man in Illinois has done without knowing what to do to the soil to make it productive. This knowledge ought to be carried to them and their children. We have it already in the laboratories of our experiment stations and agricultural colleges. It is the purpose of the bill before us to help carry, especially to the children of these farmers, such knowledge as will make them practical and highly productive farmers. It will take years to solve the problem. The knowledge, I say, has in great measure already been obtained.

The men in charge of our agricultural colleges, experiment stations, and other institutions have for many years been giving the best efforts of their lives along these lines. The problem facing us is to carry the results of their experimentation and research into the homes of the people we represent and make it a part of the lives, especially "of persons over 14 years of age who have entered upon or who are preparing to enter upon the work of the farm or the farm home," as the bill expresses it. In each State this important work will be placed in the hands of a board of three or more persons, to be designated or created by the State legislature. Whether in Kentucky, for example, this State board will try to establish independent schools or classes for the purpose of imparting the valuable information of which I have been speaking, or whether they will try to do it largely through our public schools, I do not know. My own judgment is that the only effective way to reach the masses of our people, and especially the ones this bill is largely designed to reach and help, will be through our public schools. There is no other agency so powerfully effective in carrying this knowledge into the homes and into the lives of our farmers, actual and to be, as our public-school system, when its courses of study are vocationalized and made to respond to the actual needs and necessities of life. It is vitally essential that a restorative and permanent system of soil culture be established in general practice throughout our country, else the people will soon be in dire distress for the bare necessities of life.

Mr. Davenport has said:

The world has not yet learned to feed such a population as is just ahead of us, and before the present century is ended the largest single public issue will be that of bread.

We do not have to wait for the century to end, for bread, the high cost of living, the actual necessities of life to be the biggest public question for solution before our country to-day. It is the most vital question now before our people. It was so vital in 1912 that the Democratic Party in its platform adopted at Baltimore declared:

The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home. The Republican Party in its platform attempts to escape from responsibility for present conditions, by denying that they are due to a protective tariff. We take issue with them on that subject.

That was two years before the war in Europe began. Upon that, more than any other one issue, the Democrats won the Presidency. But for that issue, hopelessly divided though the Republicans were, the Democrats would not have won. The Democrats declared in their platform and on the stump that the high robber protective tariff that the Republicans had foisted upon the people was the cause of the high cost of living. They said they would reduce the tariff and bring down the cost of living, so that the poor man would always have enough money in his purse to purchase a decent meal. On that issue largely the Democrats came into power. They did reduce the tariff. On October 3, 1913, they did erase from the statute books of our country a Republican protective tariff law and in its stead placed a so-called free-trade tariff law of their own. The high cost of living, however, did not come down. It is higher to-day than it has ever been. At no time since the Democrats came into power, now nearly four years ago, has anyone been able to buy a single thing that men or women either eat, drink, or wear at less cost than when the Republicans were in power.

Upon the contrary, the average cost of the necessities of life are higher to-day by more than 25 per cent than they were when the Democratic Party came into power on March 4, 1913. As a matter of fact, the price of foodstuffs have been going up for years.

The following table shows the average retail price of food in the United States and the amount that could be bought for $1 in each year from 1890 to November, 1916; sirloin steak excepted:

Year.	Articles.	Average retail price.	Amount bought for $1.
			Pounds.
1907	Sirloin steak, per pound	$0.181	5.5
1916	do	.268	3.7
1890	Round steak, per pound	.123	8.1
1916	do	.239	4.2
1907	Rib roast, per pound	.150	6.7

The same thing is true of other foodstuffs. The same thing is true of clothing. The high cost of living is the most serious problem confronting us.

Never in the history of the world have taxes been so high or have visited us in so many of their obnoxious forms. The estimated deficit in the United States Treasury on June 30 next is $300,000,000. The Democratic Members of Congress are now racking their brains to find out how they can still further tax the people in order to meet this deficit. How many of our people can live under existing conditions is a problem. The people have again intrusted the Democratic Party with the task and duty of solving their problems and remedying their wrongs. It is up to the Democrats, not to us. It is not certain at all that we will even control the House of Representatives after March 4. Democratic statesmen and near statesmen are now coming forth with this nostrum and that as the sure cure for the high cost of living, but among all the panaceas proposed no one of them charges that the high cost of living is due to a high protective tariff or that a free-trade tariff will bring it down. A food embargo, among other things, is proposed. After all is said and done, and after these remedies are tried out, if they are, it will doubtless be discovered that the high cost of living will still continue, and that the surest way to bring permanent relief is through more extensive, intensive, and scientific agriculture. The farmer is not now getting any more for his products than he ought to get. The consumer, though, pays twice as much for the farmer's products as the farmer sells them for. The price is raised by the middlemen, the commission merchants, the great cold-storage concerns, food trusts, and others after it leaves the farmer's hands on its way to the table of the ultimate consumer. Laws already on the statute books are probably ample to protect the people if they are vigorously and fearlessly enforced. This would help reduce the high cost of living. Those criminals who for the sake of paltry gain are cornering the food supply of the country and holding it from the mouths of hungry men and the stomachs of starving children, should be prosecuted to the limit of the law. Taxing these cold-storage concerns and others for holding foods longer than a certain period of time would help; but let me repeat that after all is said and done the fact will be found to still remain that we have got to have a greater production to meet the ever-increasing demand for foodstuffs. If we fail in this, prices will still remain distressingly high.

HOME ECONOMICS.

Home economics is the science of home making. It includes a knowledge of ventilation, cooking, hygiene, household sanitation, preparation of foods for the sick, care of children, motherhood, food values, what foods constitute a well-balanced meal, what foods are compatable and what are incompatable, and many other things of immense practical value. It is not the purpose of this bill to make provision for the farmer's boy and leave the farmer's girl and the farmer's wife to look out for themselves. It is not the purpose of this bill to make provision for the practical instruction of the miner's son and leave the miner's wife and daughter unaided in these things that are so essential to the welfare and well-being of the family. It is in the home where the chief happiness of mankind is found. All must eat some sort of food; all must live in some sort of a home. It is there where character is formed and the principles of good conduct and good citizenship instilled. It is a trite old saying that the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world. Good home makers—good mothers are the greatest asset any nation can have. The foundation of all good government is laid in the home. And since every girl is a potential mother and mistress of a home it is just as essential that she be educated along practical and useful lines as it is that her brothers be. So this bill provides that the Federal Government shall not only aid the States in paying the salaries of teachers to teach home-economic subjects but shall also aid the States in paying the salaries of teachers to train other teachers to teach these subjects. Home-economic subjects ought to be a part of the curriculum in all our public schools and their teaching made compulsory. Statistics show that 5,000,000 people in this country become ill every year from preventable diseases and 600,000 infants under 2 years of age terminate their little span of life, most of them from a lack of proper care. The young women of to-day are the home makers of to-morrow. They should be fitted and trained for their important tasks. This training should reach down to the average girl who goes to neither high school nor to college, but who one of these days will have the care of a home and a family.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRIES.

The acquiring of a commercial education is now pretty well provided throughout the country, and, while this bill makes provision for Federal aid to such education, I shall not now take time to discuss it. The feature to which I want to call your special attention is that provision of the bill which seeks to promote the welfare of the boy and girl whose parents are engaged in the industries—whose parents, and especially whose fathers, are every-day laborers. Whether they be blacksmiths, carpenters, masons, machinists, plumbers, barbers, engineers, miners, or otherwise engaged in manual labor, it matters not.

This bill is designed to reach those who are not able to send their sons and daughters to college or the university; those who need the labor of their offspring to help support the family. We are all laborers. Some work more with their heads than they do with their hands, and some work more with their hands than they do with their heads. One is just as honorable as the other. The farmer longs for the so-called leisure of the lawyer's office. The overtaxed lawyer and public servant longs for the health-giving freedom of the farm. This bill is designed to help fit for useful employment the boys and girls who can not go through high school or college but who must go to to work to help support themselves and the family. And, as I have said, there are less than 2 out of every 100 of our American boys and girls who ever reach the college or university, and 9 out of every 10 never even pass from the elementary grade to the high school or academy. This bill is designed to reach and benefit that great army of our boys and girls who never reach high school, college, or academy. The purpose of this bill is to help fit for useful employment in some trade or industry this great and ever-increasing army of American youths.

The Federal Government proposes to pay $3,000,000 annually in cooperation with the States toward the payment of salaries of teachers to teach trade, home economics, and industrial subjects, and in addition to that, $1,000,000 annually toward the payment of salaries of teachers to train teachers to teach these and agricultural subjects. All these teachers should have had actual experience in the trade or subject they undertake to teach. In the language of the bill the controlling purpose of such education shall be to "fit for useful employment" and "shall be designed to meet the needs of persons over 14 years of age who are preparing for a trade or industrial pursuit or who have entered upon the work of a trade or industrial pursuit."

There are to be three kinds of schools established—all day, part time, and evening. In the all-day schools the instruction is to be given for at least nine months out of the year to persons over 14 years of age who have not entered upon employment. The instruction for "at least half of the time" shall "be given to practical work on a useful or productive basis." The part-time schools are designed to aid workers over 14 years of age "who have entered upon employment." The evening schools are designed to aid workers over 16 years of age. The instruction to be given is to be "supplemental to the daily employment." One, if not the controlling, reason why so many children leave school at such an early age is that neither they nor their parents can see any practical benefits growing out of such education. They fail to see, and they are not alone in that, how the study of algebra, higher arithmetic, Latin, or Greek is going to aid them very materially in knowing how to feed the cow, bake the beans, or break the horse, or how to plant and till the corn or mine and load the coal, or how to paint the house or dig the ditch. It is a great sacrifice on the part of many parents not to put their children over 14 years of age into the ranks of the breadwinners.

In the great majority of cases the only way to induce the child or its parents to continue the child's education after the age of 14 is to show, at least the parents, that what the child is to learn in school will enable it to command a better wage, fit it to do something really useful, and enable it to solve life's greatest problem—the bread-and-butter one. It is essential, not only to the child but to the country of which he is an important part, that he be trained and taught in useful employment and made to know that it is just as honorable to work with the hands as it is with the head. The minds of the laboring man's children are as acute, their perceptions as keen, as those of any other class. The laboring man himself, the man who works with his hands, should hold up his head in any company and feel, what he has a got a right to feel, that he is just as honorable as any man in it.

CONCLUSION.

I am for this bill because it is designed to help develop and conserve both our natural and human resources. I am for it because it will help to promote a productive and prosperous agriculture. I am for it because it will help to increase the wage-earning power of our productive workers and greatly enhance the price of the output. It will help both employer and employee. It will greatly increase our wealth. The distinguished chairman of our committee, Mr. HUGHES, recently said in a speech:

> If we assume that a system of vocational education pursued through years of the past would have increased the wage-earning capacity of each of these 25,000,000 workers to the extent of 10 cents a day, this would have made an increase of wages for the group $2,500,000 a day, or $750,000,000 a year, with all that this would mean to the wealth and life of the Nation. This is a very moderate estimate, and the facts would probably show a difference between the earning power of the vocationally trained and the vocationally untrained of 25 cents a day. This would indicate a waste of wages through lack of training amounting to $6,250,000 every day, or $1,875,000,000 for the year. That is difficult for us to conceive and believe, but these figures are true.

The money expended for vocational education is a wise business investment. The practical training of men in any pursuit brings lasting economic returns in increased production and wage-earning power.

Miss O'Reilly, in her statement before the committee, said:

> The nation of the future which will hold the industrial supremacy of the world will be the nation which makes the things best for the markets of the world. That can only be done through the scientific organization of industry; that scientific organization of industry can only come through the training of the workers.

Miss O'Reilly is undoubtedly right in what she says.

American agriculture has prospered in the past because we have the richest soil in the world. Our people have treated it as though it were inexhaustible and as though its fertility would last forever. We know better now. To conserve our soil and feed the increasing population every farmer must be an expert.

Our American manufacturers have prospered in the past, first, because our raw materials have both been cheap and abundant; second, because of the abundance of poorly paid foreign labor that has been admitted to our shores; third, because of the executive and inventive genius of our people; and fourth, because of our production on a large scale. All these conditions can not always prevail. All of them do not prevail now. We have been selling too much raw material and not enough finished products. We ought to "sell more brains and less material." While the United States in volume of output leads the four other great manufacturing nations of the world, still our exports consist largely of "crude materials." As a matter of fact, less than one-third of the volume of our foreign commerce consists of manufactures ready for consumption. We have exploited the soil beneath our feet. We have slain the forest and robbed the hills, and in our national anthem still continue to sing that we "love" them.

The maintenance and development of our foreign trade will, as the years roll by, depend more and more upon our ability to compete with foreign nations in the products of skilled labor.

The vocationally trained artisans of England, France, and Germany excel our own in skill and efficiency. If the future battles of nations are largely to be fought in the markets of the world, as many see it; if the victory is to depend largely upon the skill and efficiency of our workers; if there is now scarcely an untrained man in all of Germany; if the workers in still other countries are better trained than in our own; if there is to be added yearly 1,000,000 untrained workers to our already 25,000,000, not 2 per cent of whom have been adequately trained for their work, then it does not take a prophet to foresee the results of the contest.

We need national aid to vocational education, because the question is a national one in its scope and because the States are unable to properly handle it. In only nine States has the work by the State as such been undertaken, and not even 1 per cent of the workers who need training have been reached.

We need national aid to vocational education because the National Government ought to introduce into our educational system, since the States have not, the needed elements to make it purposeful and useful. The Federal Government ought to stand for the principle that the aim of utility in education is just as important as the aim of culture, and is entitled to take its place in dignity by the side of it. This will do more than any other one thing to bring about a reform in our public-school system and cause the courses of study to be planned to fit the student for the practical and the useful.

It is not the purpose of this bill to take away from the State either their power or responsibility in educational matters. It is rather to stimulate and encourage them into right action along educational lines.

Its purpose is to put a practical training in the reach of the 92 per cent of our children who leave school before they ever complete a high-school grade. Its purpose is to reach out a helping hand to the poor man's son and the poor man's daughter.

I do not want to be understood as predicting that the bill before us, when enacted into law, will work any immediate revolution in our public-school system or in the lives of those now in being. It will take time for even a semblance of its influence to be seen, at least in some parts of our country. Nobody assumes that this bill has reached a solution of this great problem. Time and experience will change and modify the provisions in this bill and add to them many important features that in our ignorance, inexperience, and shortsightedness we have omitted. The future historian of our country, however, will vindicate the position of those who have sponsored and voted for this measure. The country will be indebted to them for having inaugurated a movement that will be, at least, in years to come, of far-reaching effect in determining the standing and prestige of our Nation and the usefulness of its citizenship. I am glad that the House saw fit to adopt my amendment which provided that the members of the Federal board shall be practical men and be selected from the various interests to be affected.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, this section is the controverted section. It was discussed at length before the committee not only for weeks but for months. We thought that the wording of that section as presented by the committee was simple, and allowed the board to be appointed by the President and gave him full power to appoint the board, but after consultation I think that I can say that on behalf of the committee we are willing to accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, my good friend, the chairman of the Committee on Education, is somewhat in error in the statement that the committee is unanimously in favor of accepting the proposed amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I discussed it with him a few minutes ago, and I understood that he agreed to it.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. When my friend spoke to me about the matter, I understood him to refer to another amendment—an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I regret sincerely that there should have been any misunderstanding.

I prefer to let section 6 stand as it is written, but since the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] has offered an important amendment, which seems to be favored by a majority of the committee, I shall at the proper time offer a substitute for the entire section, and I ask that I be permitted now to submit my proposed substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The section has not yet been perfected, and, as the gentleman's amendment is in the nature of a substitute, it would not be in order until the section is perfected.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Then, I desire to have my substitute read at this time for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be read at this time for information.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ABERCROMBIE: Amend the bill by striking out all of section 6 and substituting the following:

"SEC. 6. That, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, there is hereby created an executive department of the Government to be known as the department of education, which shall be under the supervision of a secretary of education, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, and whose term of office shall be the same as that of the heads of the other executive departments. The said secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for said department of such device as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken of said seal.

"There shall be in said department an assistant secretary of education, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $6,000 a year, and who shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the secretary or required by law. There shall also be such clerical assistants as may be authorized by Congress.

"The department of education shall have power to cooperate with State boards in carrying out the provisions of this act, and it shall be the duty of said department to make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports with particular reference to their use in aiding the States in the establishment of vocational schools and classes and in giving instruction in agriculture, trades and industries, commerce and commercial pursuits, and home economics."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUGHES. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the comma after the word "workers," on page 9, line 11; also, in line 14, after the word "pursuits"; also, in line 15, after the word "workers"; also, in line 17, after the word "principles." All of those commas should be changed to semicolons.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 11, after the word "workers," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon; same page, line 14, after the word "pursuit," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon; same page, line 15, after the word "workers," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon; and in line 17, after the word "principles," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chariman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, after line 11, add the following:

"Said board may from time to time appoint advisory committees made up of persons representing industries, commerce, labor, agriculture, home making, or general or vocational education, to assist them by advice in the administration of this act, and may fix the compensation of such advisory committee, but not more than $50,000 shall be expended by the board for this purpose."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that has just been adopted, proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], providing for a representative board, was one of the amendments that I stated in general debate upon the Indian bill I would offer. Another amendment that I stated at that time I would offer is the amendment that is now pending, providing that this vocational board may appoint from time to time advisory committees, with a limitation upon the expenditures that it may make of $50,000 per year. Now, Mr. Chairman, upon this section 6, in many respects the most important in this bill, two great bodies have given it great consideration and have united in their conclusions upon it—the United States Chamber of Commerce and the American Federation of Labor. Both of those bodies, usually more or less antagonistic to each other, urged the adoption of this amendment that is now pending. The United States Chamber of Commerce in a pamphlet, which no doubt all Members have received, in digesting the House and Senate bills, have this to say concerning this proposition:

The change asked by the national chamber's committee is that the Federal board should be required to appoint advisory committees of five each, representing industry, commerce, labor, agriculture, homemaking, and general or vocational education. Each committee should be appointed only for such a time as the Federal board determines, and the members should receive for the time of their actual service both compensation and their traveling expenses. The members of each committee should be chosen to represent as many different parts of the country as the geographical distribution of the industry being studied will permit.

That is the attitude of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Now, in reference to the attitude of the American Federation of Labor, I read from the report of the executive council made to the last annual convention of the federation, as follows:

It is our opinion that this new board should be composed of representative men but not partisan representatives of the administration in power. Its personnel should represent the great fundamental activities of life, namely, agriculture, labor, commerce, industry, and education, and the local advisory boards should be equally representative, so that the human activities of the Republic could feel assured that experienced, tested men from their own vocations, such as labor, commerce, agriculture, industry, and education should be fairly and efficiently represented.

That, Mr. Chairman, expresses the views of these two great bodies that are primarily interested in this great subject, the employer of labor and the labor employees themselves.

Now, I am anxious to expedite the consideration of this bill, and I shall not take the time to go into the reasons for these advisory committees as I would under other circumstances, but it can all be summed up in the proposition that this bill should be perfected to the greatest extent possible, so as to insure practical vocational education to the youth of our land, and that means that practical standards should be adopted by this board, composed of practical men, and in so far as they need advice they should have it from practical men. As the bill now stands, Mr. Chairman, it is made mandatory upon this vocational board to get their information through the various departments, the Department of Labor, the Department of Agriculture, and other departments, and that means that this bill—with all due respect to the committee, and I do respect it most highly—in its operation, although that was not the intent of the committee, would make the administration of this bill based upon theory rather than upon practical knowledge.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman just a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and refer him to lines 17 to 19, page 10 of the bill, where this language occurs:

The Federal board for vocational education shall have the power to employ such assistants as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Would not that give them the right kind?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, that is the phraseology that we always use in bills contemplating permanent employees or officials. It does not contemplate this kind of a board at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, we need the practical men in order to get these uniform standards, in order that they shall be standards that will not merely make an avenue to drain the money from the Federal Treasury to the States for the purpose of paying it over to them upon some theoretical system of education, but in order to make every dollar that goes out of the State treasury mean something of value to the boys and girls of the land; and if that is to be done we need practical advice, instead of compelling this board to get their information through college graduates, specialists if you please, and trained people if you please. After all, in the performance of this great work there is no graduate in economics, there is no professor of economics anywhere in the United States that can give the effective advice required for the making of these standards, the practical standards that we would have by actual advice of men who know what they are talking about because they have lived in their trade or business and have been brought up in it. I sincerely hope that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. TOWNER rose.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I understand what the bill carries, and I think I understand the amendment that has been agreed to by the House. But if I understand this present amendment, it proposes to create boards, at an expense of $50,000 a year, not exceeding $50,000 a year. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; coming out of the $200,000 already provided for.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; coming out of the $200,000. That is the whole amount provided for?

Mr. LENROOT. For the administration of the board.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Now, the amendment, if we must have a board, provides for the appointment by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate, of a board of five. That other provision cares for all this appropriation to be cared for, not by a board of several or by several boards but at a total expense of $20,000. This is a proposition to make an additional expense at least of $30,000. It may be $130,000, as the case may be. The only limit is the $200,000, as I understand it. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman means the expense of these advisory committees, that is $50,000.

Mr. CANNON. Then this is an increase of $30,000. It is $50,000 for the advisory committees that the gentleman's amendment covers. Is that right?

Mr. LENROOT. A limit of $50,000.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; a limit of $50,000. Now, I have listened and have gained my knowledge of this bill not by prior investigation but as the debate has proceeded and from reading the bill and report. I apprehend that it is going to pass. Perhaps it ought to pass. I may get into a condition where I will vote for it [laughter], if I keep on learning, before the final vote comes.

But we have been urged to pass this bill. What for? To encourage the States. That is it; not to take possession. It is a donation from Uncle Sam for the education of the people, to encourage the States to participate. How are they to participate? They are to participate through the State boards. Well, I suppose those State boards ought to know what they want. I presume they will know what they want, with the approval now of the Federal board that is provided for by the amendment that is agreed to.

Great Heavens! It looks to me more and more as if this is a proposition to create unnecessary offices, and God knows if there is a government in the world that has now so many unnecessary offices, multiplied and multiplied, and a disposition to multiply further, and with a notice now to make a Cabinet officer out of the head of the Bureau of Education, which is to be offered in an amendment later. Let us give something to the States, to encourage the States, and if they do not select boards that are skilled, then the whole thing fails, because they must cooperate if they get a part of this fund.

Maybe I have grown old; maybe I am not practical. But with the amazing amount of legislation that we have had for the last decade, some of it under us God-blessed Republicans [laughter], saints, as I call them [laughter]—but you have "seen us" and "raised the limit" [laughter]—do you not think you had better take an account of stock for a little while? Let us be practical. Let us have something out of all this legislation to go to the children, for whose betterment we are trying to legislate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Lenroot amendment, for the reason that I think it will make this bill more practical. I believe the amendment just adopted, proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], has made this bill more practical and I am heartily in favor of it. When we consider that an army of a million of young people of school age finish their education each year before they are 15 years of age, before completing the eighth grade, we must come to the conclusion that this measure is the most important measure that we have considered, not only at this session but the most important measure that has been considered for many sessions of Congress. It is the greatest conservation movement before the people—the conservation of the efficiency of the industrial workers.

In Wisconsin we have had some experience with vocational education. We passed a law in 1911, and while it contained a board like the one proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, we did not have these advisory committees, and we did not administer the law in a practical way. The educators on the board administered the law, and not the practical men on the board. But in the last two years we have had advisory committees similar to the one proposed in the Lenroot amendment, and we have accomplished more in the last two years in making vocational educaction practical than we did in the several years before. The Wisconsin Board of Industrial Education is composed of three employers of labor, three skilled employees, the State superintendent of public instruction, the dean of the College of Engineering, and the dean of the extension department of the University of Wisconsin. This board is well balanced, very efficient, and is doing a wonderful work.

We went through the motions of vocational education for several years before. Our young men who were studying manual training and vocational training spent their time making bootjacks and birch-bark bird houses and coat hangers, but did not get down to the real, practical work of vocational education.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If Wisconsin has done so admirably upon her own motion, can not the other States, under this law that we propose to pass, be trusted to be as wise as Wisconsin through their various boards, providing one-half of the amount from their State treasuries? Oh, we have got some wisdom in the other States. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNE. I think the other States can be trusted, but if we can hurry this matter up it is important to do so. Every year there are a million young people going out of school before finishing the eighth grade, with no education that will help them to make a living, and if we can hurry up their training a few years we shall be doing a great service to them and the entire country, and really making more advancement in conservation than by any of these other conservation movements. It will simply get us along quicker if the Government gives some aid, as it is giving aid in all these other activities. Now, this amendment is simply the adoption of the German system. About 30 years ago Bismarck said to his educators that the education system of Germany was not practical enough, and he practically took the vocational education or industrial education of Germany out of the hands of the schoolmasters and placed it in the hands of practical men and created boards composed of employers of labor and skilled laborers, and as a result of that practical education we have the great efficiency of the German people to-day. There are practically no able-bodied people in Germany who are not self-supporting. She sets an example for the world in this respect.

The city of Munich probably has greater efficiency in its industrial workers than any other city in the world, due to its board of vocational education which is composed of 23 representatives of local occupations, and Dr. Kirchen Steiner, its superintendent, says of his advisory board:

> I could not have gotten along in any other way. The personnel of my board causes each local occupation, 50 in all, to be taught with a particularity and an intensiveness that make the city lead in its industries in all the markets of the world.

Munich has an advisory board of some 20 members who are conversant with all the different industries taught, of which there are about 50. Now, as I say, we can not make this bill too practical. We have made it practical in one way by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], and I believe we will make it still more practical by adopting the amendment of my colleague [Mr. LENROOT]. The great weakness of industrial education in the different States to-day is that it does not give a practical education that will enable a boy to be proficient enough in his trade to earn a good living. The great fault in many of our law schools to-day is that we have theoretical lawyers, law professors who have never appeared in court and never tried a case, who are teaching law; while the law schools that have practical men, who are in active practice and who come to the lecture room from the courts, are the ones that are turning out young men who are practical and efficient lawyers, and I believe we should proceed in this way in vocational education, along practical lines, by having a representative board and giving them the opportunity offered by this amendment to consult with practical and experienced men from all the various industries.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The provision of the amendment is that there shall be five advisory boards appointed by the Federal board.

Mr. LENROOT. The number is not limited.

Mr. TOWNER. The number is not limited. There may be more than that. I accepted the statement that was submitted to the United States Chamber of Commerce. These boards shall consist of five or more members. These gentlemen are to have $50,000 appropriated among themselves each year for the purpose of enabling them to advise the central board here in Washington regarding the performance of its duties. I was very much amused with the suggestion of my friend from Wisconsin that these advisory boards, that are to come here from all over the United States to tell the commission how to perform their duties, are a practical institution. I imagine them coming here from all over the country to advise the commission in a practical way about how to perform the duties of their office.

I thought the President ought to have a free hand in the appointment of the commission. I yielded in my judgment to the limitation that has been placed upon the President in the appointment of the commission. I have done this against my judgment, but for the purpose of securing a speedy conclusion of the consideration of this bill. But when it comes to taking $50,000 out of the $200,000 fund for the purpose of making a holiday excursion for men from California and Colorado and all over the United States to come here and advise this general board how to perform its duties, it seems to me that the proposition is nothing else than ridiculous. The provision of the bill is—

Such studies, investigations, and reports concerning agriculture, for the purposes of agricultural education, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Agriculture.

I wonder if my friend from Wisconsin considers that the work of the Department of Agriculture is merely theoretical? Yet this work is to be done in conjunction with the Agricultural Department of the Government, so as to save this additional expense and make the work of the commission more effective. The bill says that—

Such studies, investigations, and reports concerning trades and industries, for the purposes of trade and industrial education, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Labor.

I wonder if my friend thinks that the Secretary of Labor is a purely theoretical man, and that those who are associated with him would give the board merely theoretical advice? And so on with regard to the other departments.

This bill is framed on the idea that there shall be cooperation with these various departments named in the bill, and that the various specialists shall aid in advising and assisting the commission in the conduct of its work. I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will be voted down, because I believe it will be a useless and a needless expenditure of $50,000 of money that could be better applied for the practical work of the board.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has built up a man of straw and then has proceeded to demolish it. The gentleman says that we propose to throw away $50,000 in furnishing junketing trips for the members of this committee. The gentleman from Iowa knows that in the language of the bill as it now stands, and which he approves of, it appropriates any sum up to $200,000 for the purpose of making this very study and investigation. The difference between my amendment and his proposition is that I want some practical knowledge brought through these studies and investigations and he does not care whether there is any practical knowledge or not.

The gentleman talks about the Department of Agriculture. I frankly admit that these studies can be made through the Department of Agriculture, because their experts are made up to-day of efficient, practical men, as a rule. But when he comes to the other departments, when he speaks of the Department of Labor he furnishes no argument when he says that the Secretary of Labor is a competent man. He is, but Secretary of Labor Wilson is not going to make these studies and investigations. The Department of Labor is a splendid bureau through which to get information and statistics, but it is valueless, practically speaking, so far as furnishing this board with information concerning the one great question of making uniform standards for vocational education.

The gentleman talks as if my amendment was mandatory. It is discretionary with this board whether they call upon these men or not, and if this board desires the views and experience of practical men in fixing these standards, will anyone say why the board should not have the authority to call upon practical men to furnish it? They are not required to call upon them, they are not required to appoint a single committee unless they choose to do it, but my amendment gives them the right to do it. Mr. Chairman, I insist that if this bill is to be something more than a drainage tube from the Federal Treasury to the State treasury, that we ought to adopt every safeguard possible, and this amendment furnishes one of the safeguards.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if it would not be very much better to call men in who have practical information to convey to the board than it would be for the board to hold hearings in order to obtain the information or facts that practical men might have?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; very much better for this board to meet men face to face and get its information from them than to get it from specialists from some bureau second hand.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, just one minute. Lines 17, 18, and 19 of this section gives the power to the Federal board that this amendment proposes to give.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. FESS (reading)—

It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to carry out the rules, regulations, and decisions which the board may adopt. The Federal board for vocational education shall have power to employ such assistants as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman—who is familiar with the phraseology used in legislative acts—whether he thinks for one moment that the word "assistants" in that section contemplates anything of this kind?

Mr. FESS. That is the way it is written.

Mr. LENROOT. Then it differs from all other bills that we have had.

Mr. FESS. The purpose of this provision is to link up the Federal board with the Government agencies and to get through these special organizations now already created what is needed without creating a separate organization with increased expenditure.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from Ohio think that the language he has just read authorizes the Federal board to employ clerks, and nothing else?

Mr. FESS. It authorizes the board to employ anyone without limit of salary that it sees fit to make the investigation and to make the board effective. We state that this investigation shall be made as far as possible in matters of labor through the Labor Department, and in matters of commerce through the Commerce Department, and in matters of agriculture through the Agricultural Department, and our purpose is not to create a separate commission with increased salaries—a thing we are all tired of—but to get this work done by experts in departments already created. There is no place in the world where we have as many investigators, such a group of scholars, such a group of practical men as we have in the various executive departments now under control of the President of the United States, and we do not want needlessly to create a special commission to do this work, but we wish to do it through already created boards under the jurisdiction of our cabinet officers. This was the purpose of omitting this special advisory board, and it seems to me unwise to create a new commission with an additional expense. The amendment providing for representation of the various fields which we just adopted insures against impractical methods.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the language of the bill permitted the very thing that my amendment proposes, and then at the conclusion of his argument he says that that is not the intention. What is the gentleman's view of it?

Mr. FESS. The gentleman's view of the matter is that the Federal board can make the investigation that it thinks is necessary to make it effective, to make the bill practicable through all the existing departments here instead of creating a separate commission to do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] be to create a number of new place holders and supernumeraries, who would be simply in addition to the officers already created by us?

Mr. FESS. That is one reason I am objecting to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is the most important feature of the bill and that it ought to be adopted. The language read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], contained on lines 17, 18, 19, of page 10, if it does anything, authorizes the board which the bill creates to employ a permanent staff of investigators who will be on the pay roll for all time, whereas the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] proposes to authorize the appointment of an advisory board or boards of practical men in their various lines. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] says that the bill proposes to make the investigations through the Agricultural Department, through the Department of Labor, and through the Department of Commerce, and I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio what the Department of Labor knows about the various trades of the United States, or what the Department of Commerce knows about the various activities in the commerce of the United States, excepting in so far as they are able to compile a lot of statistics in connection with the movement of commodities. If you want to get information about the activities of the commerce of the United States and of the practical things in connection with the movements of men engaged in commerce, you want to talk to the men who are engaged in the industries of the United States. If you want to get the practical information about the trades of the United States, you must talk to the men who are in the trades of the United States, and not to the Department of Labor, whose offices are filled with a lot of politicians who know nothing about trades.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asks why you would go to the Department of Agriculture to find information pertaining to agriculture.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, let the gentleman talk about the other things. I have not criticized that part of it.

Mr. FESS. I think I would go to the Department of Agriculture because I would find a group of people there who probably know more about the science of agriculture than any other group that probably could be found anywhere.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my friend does not do me justice. He does not state what I stated. I said you provided in this bill that you should. I did not say that you ought not to go. What I say is that you ought not to go to the Department of Labor or to the Department of Commerce, because neither of these departments knows anything about the practical side of the things with which they deal.

Mr. CANNON. Then they ought to be abolished.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not treat of the practical side of the life of the country. They are compiling statistics; they are making records of things done by people who have practical knowledge; and if you want to get practical knowledge, you must go to the man who has it. It is not in the possession of any man in either of these departments, for he is not working at his trade, and most of the men in the departments have no trade and have no knowledge of trades.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is this Federal board of vocational education, consisting of the United States Commissioner of Education and four members appointed by the President of the United States, to do?

Mr. MADDEN. They are to regulate the conduct of the education which is provided for in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that the President will appoint five men competent to do this work?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no knowledge of what the President will do. Judging from what he has done in the past, I would rather doubt it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think we ought to appoint an advisory board for the Interstate Commerce Commission to tell it what to do?

Mr. MADDEN. We have already provided for the appointment of an advisory board for a more important board than the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Federal Reserve Bank Board is being advised by men of intelligence, men of practical experience.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we create these Federal boards and then create advisory boards to wet-nurse them, why do not we create the United States Chamber of Commerce on one side and the American Federation of Labor on the other to wet-nurse the Congress of the United States and tell it what to do?

Mr. MADDEN. We are only providing that the appointments shall be made, and any provision for appointments that may be made ought to be on practical lines, and that is suggested in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 27, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 12, after the word "education," add the following: "or any member thereof."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] for just a moment. This amendment that I have offered is for the purpose of perfecting the section in accordance with the amendment of mine which was adopted a little while ago. The bill provides that the Commissioner of Education may make such recommendations to the board relative to the administration of this act as he may from time to time deem advisable. That was upon the theory that he was to be the chairman of the board. My amendment, which was adopted a while ago, provides that this chairman shall be annually elected by the members of the board, and so I have added, after the word "education," the words "or any member thereof" may make these recommendations to the board. That is the gist of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. POWERS) there were—ayes 16, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 10, line 15, strike out the words "Commissioner of Education" and insert in lieu thereof the words "chairman of the board."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, this is another amendment, offered for the purpose of perfecting the bill as amended. The original bill provides it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to carry out the rules and regulations and decisions which the board may adopt. That was under the theory that the Commissioner of Education was going to be the chairman of the board, and that has been changed. He may be the chairman and he may not be the chairman. Therefore I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Education" and say "the chairman of the board."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I sincerely hope the committee will accept the amendment, since the amendment has been adopted providing the board shall elect its own chairman. The duty of carrying out the regulations should devolve upon the chairman and not upon the Commissioner of Education, who now merely becomes a member ex officio of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me in view of the amendment that has been adopted that we should strike out of the bill, beginning at line 12, down to the word "adopt" in line 17, for the reason that the Commissioner of Education is now a member of this board and acts with the board at all times.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. And this provision which is made with the view that the Commissioner of Education should be chairman of the board is now unnecessary, and this part of the bill should be stricken out.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. It strikes me that the provision there that the Commissioner of Education should make recommendation to the board is not based solely on the fact that he is chairman of the board, or based on the fact that he is an officer of the Government. It is presumed that he has the same policy in regard to education that is common to the other members of the board. His investigation as an expert educator should be useful to the board. On no other theory would he make any recommendation at all. The board meets in order to make their own recommendation.

Mr. DOWELL. In answer to the gentleman I merely desire to say that the Commissioner of Education under the amendment is now one of the commissioners. He is present and acts with this commission and is a part of it. He may submit at any time any suggestions or recommendations he desires, the same as any other commissioner. Why should we give one commissioner a certain right to recommend that we do not give to all, when they now stand upon an equal footing? It seems to me that these lines should be stricken out, and when it is in order I desire to make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 17, strike out section 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The administration of this act shall be under the control of the Commissioner of Education."

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield? I have one or two amendments to offer in order to perfect the section. If I do not waive the right, I have no objection to his going on.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow, there has been read prior to this time an amendment by way of substitute to the entire section, offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE], and until the section is perfected the Chair would hold that the gentleman's amendment is not now in order.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the Chair is right about that, and I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 21, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is an agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same amendment on line 1, page 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 1, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. And the same amendment, Mr. Chairman, in line 5, page 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 5, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. And on line 9 strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 9, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not, in view of the fact that the Commissioner of Education is no longer chairman of the board, lines 14, 15, and 16 should not come out on page 10.

Mr. HUGHES. It has been amended to cover that part.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment by way of substitute——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment which in view of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. POWERS) should now be offered, inasmuch as the language has been changed. I move to strike out lines 12, 13, and 14 to the period.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL. Page 10, lines 12, 13, and 14, strike out the following language:

"The Commissioner of Education may make such recommendations to the board relative to the administration of this act as he may from time to time deem advisable."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. Was that amendment not voted on a few moments ago?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment was not voted upon. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOWELL. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment, by way of substitute for the entire section, offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE].

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the committee I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to read the whole substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment by way of substitute will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ABERCROMBIE: Amend the bill by striking out all of section 6 and substituting the following:

"SEC. 6. That, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, there is hereby created an executive department of the Government to be known as the department of education, which shall be under the supervision of a secretary of education, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, and whose term of office shall be the same as that of the heads of the other executive departments. The said secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for said department of such device as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken of said seal.

"There shall be in said department an assistant secretary of education, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $6,000 a year, and who shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the secretary or required by law. There shall also be such clerical assistants as may be authorized by Congress.

"The department of education shall have power to cooperate with State boards in carrying out the provisions of this act, and it shall be the duty of said department to make, or cause to have made, studies, investigations, and reports, with particular reference to their use in aiding the States in the establishment of vocational schools and classes and in giving instruction in agriculture, trades and industries, commerce and commercial pursuits, and home economics."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order, and the gentleman from Tennessee reserves it. But the gentleman from Illinois makes it. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It clearly is not germane to the bill. It creates an executive department of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the gentleman from Illinois is a universally recognized authority in the matter of the interpretation and application of the rules of this House. In fact, I have never known his superior as a parliamentarian. I submit, however, that the proposed substitute seems to be germane. Section 6 provides an agency for carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and the substitute which I offer for section 6 provides an agency for carrying into effect the provisions of this act. Their purposes are the same; their duties the same.

Section 6 as originally drawn created a board, to be composed of five Cabinet officers and the Commissioner of Education. Section 6 as reported by the Committee on Education creates a similar board, to be composed of the Commissioner of Education as ex-officio chairman and four members to be appointed by the President. The substitute which I offer creates an agency for a similar purpose. Instead of creating a board it establishes a department and charges it with the duty of administering the provisions of this act. The proposed substitute confers upon the proposed department no power, no duty, that is not directly connected with the purposes and provisions of this act and that is not conferred upon the proposed board.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the proposed amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The proposed amendment, a substitute, is not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BORLAND: Page 8, line 17, strike out section 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The administration of this act shall be under the control of the Commissioner of Education."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment should be adopted it would, of course, necessitate unanimous consent or subsequent amendment to change the other portions of the bill. It seems to me that there is no magic in the word "board." In fact, we may sometimes attribute to a board virtues that it really does not possess.

The first bill passed by Congress providing for cooperation with the States in an activity which was formerly considered to be entirely within the State's jurisdiction was the road bill. The road bill, I think, furnished the model for this bill. But in the road bill, in order to get it passed and approved by the people and their Representatives, it was provided that as much of the money as possible should go directly to the object to be accomplished, namely, the construction of roads. Care was taken that an undue amount of the money should not be absorbed in the creation of salaried positions. It seems that that reasoning is just as cogent in this matter as it was in the case of the road bill. In other words, it seems that what we want to do is to stimulate education and provide as much of the Federal activities in that direction as possible and to spend as little as we can on the machinery of the administration.

Now, I say that is what we want to do. I take it that that is what the House wants to do. I would not want to assume that the House wants to create unnecessary offices. But if we did not find it necessary in administering the great road fund—more than twice the size of this fund—to provide for a board, but considered that the whole result could be accomplished by having the States submit their plans to the Department of Agriculture and having the proper officials there approve that plan and have it carried out under the direct supervision of the States, it seems to me that method can be followed here. And if the real plan is to stimulate the States and encourage them to submit a plan of vocational education to the approval of the Federal Government, that approval can be rendered by one official much more expeditiously and effectively than it could be done by a board. We did not find it necessary to create a board to administer the road law, and yet it apparently seems to be desired here to create a board to administer this law. With all due respect to the committee, it does seem to create unnecessary offices.

Nor can I understand why a bipartisan board should be necessary in this particular matter when it was not necessary in the case of the road law. Here is each State presumably with its own political policy and aspiration; it has to submit certain plans of education, and then those plans of education are to be passed upon and approved and cooperated in by the Federal Government. There does not seem to be in that anything requiring a bipartisan board.

But I can very easily understand—and this, I think, is the real evil to be avoided—that, if we create such a bipartisan board, in a few years it will not be limited in its total expenditures to $200,000, but we will be the recipients of telegrams and letters and newspaper articles and other inspired literature demanding that we increase the amount available for that tremendous and important board of the Federal Government. Every board runs its tentacles—its roots—down into the social, industrial, and commercial bodies of the country, and the first thing you know we have got support from some source for that board. That does not always occur with a strictly administrative officer. It does seem to me that we can strengthen this bill very materially and add to its efficiency in many respects if we will dispense with the board. The board, after all, can agree upon only one plan of action. If they disagree we certainly have a source of weakness instead of a source of strength. All the board can accomplish is to unite, to agree, upon a policy. It seems to me that policy can be carried out much more efficiently by one executive officer than by a board. I think the total result of section 6 as now drawn, and especially as amended by the amendment, which I voted against, to create classes out of which this board shall be selected—the total result is to weaken the section, and we will still more weaken it if we leave the board in existence at all. I think the board ought to be stricken out and the commissioner of education left in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment by way of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were—ayes 10, noes 39.

Accordingly the amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 6 be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture, the trades, industries, and home economics; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to authorize the appropriation of money and to regulate its expenditure, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request:

FLORENCE, S. C., January 2, 1917.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Please secure five days' leave of absence and arrange pairs. I am in favor of probe.

J. W. RAGSDALE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this request will be granted.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KITCHIN, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the vocational educational bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the vocational educational bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 3, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee in prayer because our confidence and hope is in Thy steadfastness. Thou dost not change. Thou dost not wait upon our willingness to follow. Thou hast led us by Thy hand in paths that we have not known, paths that lie beyond the reach of our thoughts and plans. Thou hast led us; Thou hast increased us in prosperity; Thou hast lavished upon us the blessings of the divine mind. We come before Thee to pray that Thou wouldst guide us this day in the discharge of our duties and lead us forward true to the great principles that we have committed ourselves to as a Nation, and loyal to the name of the God of our fathers. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—SECRETS OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask leave to consume a minute or two at this time.

On yesterday, in discussing a question of personal privilege, I adverted to the fact that confidential communications made to the State Department had been shown to people, and perhaps copies of documents given to people not entitled to have them. I ought to have said then, what I ask leave to say now, that these official misdeeds did not occur since Secretary Lansing has been at the head of that department, but occurred long before. I am absolutely sure that no Secretary of State or any other high official in that department has at any time had cognizance of the acts to which I referred and which I condemned, but quite the contrary.

Wishing to make my statement of yesterday complete and plain, I have thought I should supplement the statement of yesterday by what I have just said, showing that nothing I referred to occurred since Mr. Lansing has been at the head of the State Department; moreover, I will add that I am sure Secretary Lansing has taken every step possible to prevent a recurrence of such misconduct as I adverted to.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for salary of an assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be appointed by the Secretary, with compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum, etc. (S. Doc. No. 660), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for increase of salary of the Government actuary under control of the Treasury Department, from $2,500 to $4,000 per annum (S. Doc. No. 661), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 304), as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on January 2, 1917, entitled "Absentee Voting," prepared by the Legislative Reference Division of the Library of Congress, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the manuscript be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SAFETY AT SEA (S. DOC. NO. 658).

Mr. CHILTON. On the 22d of December I reported from the Committee on Printing Senate resolution 299, to print a manuscript submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is now at his home ill. I asked unanimous consent at that time for the immediate consideration of the resolution, and I thought it was granted and the manuscript ordered printed. I see by the RECORD, however, that it was not, and I now ask unanimous consent that Senate resolution 299 be taken up out of order from the calendar and passed. I send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, showing the importance of printing the document, and I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD. The cost will be only about $70. It is an important matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia desire to have the letter read?

Mr. CHILTON. No; let it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, October 3, 1916.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am returning herewith a pamphlet entitled "Safety at Sea—proposed coastwise pilot charts showing the safety zones and danger spaces for the prevention of collisions at sea," by Capt. Armistead Rust, United States Navy, which was forwarded with your letter dated September 5, 1916.

In view of the great and increasing importance of the general subject of steamship lanes and the desirability of making readily available all contributions on the various points involved in safeguarding navigation on the high seas, it is recommended, without passing upon the merits of the details of the plan proposed by Capt. Rust, that the text and illustrations of Capt. Rust's paper be printed as a Senate document.

Respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 299) reported by Mr. CHILTON from the Committee on Printing December 22, 1916, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on July 25, 1916, entitled "Safety at Sea—proposed coastwise pilot charts, showing safety zones and danger places," by Capt. Armistead Rust, United States Navy, be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the superintendent of the Botanic Garden from $2,000 to $2,500, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 18542), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MINING ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I apprehend that when the appropriate order of business is reached the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] will consume in its discussion a good part of the morning hour. Before we reach that, knowing that I could not get the matter for which I desire to ask consideration considered at that time, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to Order of Business on the Calendar 790, being the bill (H. R. 12426) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations. It is a bill which passed the House at the last session; it has been reported favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body; and while I do not now seek, of course, to secure its passage during the morning hour, I am anxious to have a date set upon which a vote may be had upon the bill.

I have, therefore, prepared the following request for a unanimous-consent agreement:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, January 30, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of H. R. 12426, an act to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations, and during that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on said day, January 30, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto.

I do not wish in any way to interfere with the progress of the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, but I have read my proposition for a unanimous-consent agreement, so that I might anticipate if there is going to be an objection, and thereby save the calling of the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no knowledge of the bill in which the Senator from Arizona is interested; very likely it is a most meritorious measure, but I desire to suggest a point of order to the effect that we can not by unanimous consent agree to consider a bill that is not before the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. The bill has been favorably reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it is not before the Senate for consideration, and I make the point of order, Mr. President. If we should agree to such propositions as this we might consume all the time in asking for unanimous-consent agreements to consider bills when they were not under consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I confess that the point of order is well taken. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12426.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall have to make the point of order on that motion, that until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, under the rules, the motion is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order must be sustained by the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I confess the point of order. I do not wish to press the matter this morning, but I merely desire to state that this is a bill which has passed the other House; that it is of great importance, not only to the entire West but to all the Indians, and I have felt that I have been somewhat negligent in not pressing the matter before. I now give notice that at the earliest opportunity, when I am in order, and when convenient to the Senate, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

GARDEN CITY MOVEMENT.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 305), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the garden city and garden suburb movement in Europe has made wonderful progress during the first eight years of its existence; and

Whereas the object of this movement is to secure permanent and comfortable homes for the people on terms within the reach of the average income and to combine the advantages of town and country in the same community; and

Whereas this movement is contributing materially to the health, comfort, and prosperity of the people who have experienced its benefits; and

Whereas the movement, in the estimation of many, points the way to the long-sought goal of a contented, home-owning population; and

Whereas a beginning along this line is claimed to have been made in the United States; and

Whereas thousands of American citizens have petitioned Members of Congress for an investigation of the movement both in Europe and the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized and requested to hear and consider such testimony as may be produced before said committee in Washington regarding this movement both in Europe, in the United States, and elsewhere, and to report its findings to the Senate.

REPUBLIC OF CUBA V. STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent and other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution which I submitted on yesterday, being Senate resolution 300, go over without prejudice, to be called up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina requests that the resolution submitted by him and coming over from a previous day may go over until to-morrow without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PEACE OVERTURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution (S. Res. 298) submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 298) submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK December 22, 1916, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there is very little that I care to say, or that I can profitably say, on this resolution in addition to what I said on yesterday, unless and until some objections are raised to it. I have endeavored to avoid objections by putting the resolution into such concise and limited shape as would make its passage simply an indorsement of the President's act in asking the warring nations to state the terms on which they will consider peace. I have carefully avoided those portions of the President's notes which might provoke controversy.

I realize that in this Chamber, as elsewhere in the United States, there may be two opinions upon some of the suggestions made by the President in those notes, but I do not see how anywhere there can be any two opinions upon the proposition that in the interests of humanity and of civilization this country should appeal to the nations now at war to state the terms upon which they will consider peace. I realize that such a statement, if made at the present time, would indicate that the nations are far apart; but some time that statement must be made. It is the inevitable first step that must be taken.

Mr. President, we have in our minds a precedent for similar action of quite recent date. It was, I think, in January when peace talk between Japan and Russia, who were then at war, first started, and it was not until a number of months after that time that it was possible to bring those two great warring nations together. The then President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, undertook to do it. In his instructions to our ambassadors abroad, he used this language:

The President feels that the time has come when in the interest of all mankind he must endeavor to see if it is not possible to bring to an end the terrible and lamentable conflict now being waged. With both Russia and Japan the United States has inherited ties of friendship and good will. It hopes for the prosperity and welfare of each, and it feels that the progress of the world is set back by the war between these two great nations.

The President accordingly urges the Russian and Japanese Governments not only for their own sakes but in the interest of the whole civilized world, to open direct negotiations for peace with one another. The President suggests that these peace negotiations be conducted directly and exclusively between the belligerents; in other words, that there may be a meeting of Russian and Japanese plenipotentiaries or delegates, without any intermediary, in order to see if it is not possible for these representatives of the two powers to agree to terms of peace. The President earnestly asks that the Russian [Japanese] Government do now agree to such meeting and is asking the Japanese [Russian] Government likewise to agree.

While the President does not feel that any intermediary should be called in in respect to the peace negotiations themselves, he is entirely willing to do what he properly can if the two powers concerned feel that his services will be of aid in arranging the preliminaries as to the time and place of meeting. But, if even these preliminaries can be arranged directly between the two powers, or in any other way, the President will be glad, as his sole purpose is to bring about a meeting which the whole civilized world will pray may result in peace.

Mr. President, the author of this book from which I am reading, entitled Termination of War and Treaties of Peace, is Mr. Coleman Phillipson, an Englishman, and he goes on to describe how Japan showed a disposition to accept at once this suggestion from this great neutral country. He describes also how averse the Russian Government was to accepting, but how finally, by the urgings of the President of the United States, carried even to the Czar personally, the President was finally successful in inducing Russia to undertake those negotiations which finally resulted, as we all know, in peace.

Now, Mr. President, the President of the United States has not gone as far as Theodore Roosevelt went. He has only asked these warring countries to say what are the possible terms of peace. He has not asked them to make peace; he has not asked them to cease the war; he has not invited them to a conference; he has made a request even less than the request made by Theodore Roosevelt at that time. And, Mr. President, if, as stated by Theodore Roosevelt in this document, it was important for the welfare of humanity and civilization to end that war, how much greater strength is there in the plea at the present time to end the existing war, which is so many times more terrible, so many times more destructive, and loaded with so many times more dangers to civilization and to humanity? If there was occasion then to make that request from a great neutral to the warring nations of the world, how much greater is the occasion at the present time, when all civilization is in danger, when four or five of the great nations of the world are threatened with famine, when a million men are being killed every year and possibly two or three millions crippled, when even the existence of neutral nations is becoming difficult and almost impossible, when the rights of neutrals are being trampled on as they were not trampled on in the Russo-Japanese war, and when the very existence of civilized society is endangered by the continuation of a war which is revolutionizing conditions in every great country of the world?

Mr. President, that is my reason for believing, in short, that the Senate of the United States is charged with a great responsibility. It is the one great legislative body of the world that has a right to speak, because under the Constitution it is charged with great duties coordinate with those of the President in international affairs. I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that this resolution may have the general support of this great body.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, ordinarily I believe that all matters of importance connected with our foreign relations should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations before we act upon them, but this resolution is so simple and the propriety of its passage seems so clear that I was gratified yesterday to hear the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], express a desire for senatorial action without further delay.

The resolution clearly and briefly states what the Senate is asked to do. We only approve and strongly indorse "the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed."

There can be no step toward peace without a statement from each side of the terms upon which peace might be reached. The door seemed a little ajar looking toward negotiations and toward peace, and the President sought to prevent the door from closing hard and fast to prevent negotiations.

Mr. President, I conceive that the neutral nations of the world have a right to express a view upon this subject. The rights of our own country have been disregarded over and over again by each of the contending forces. We have protested; we have called attention to the disregard of our rights. We have not contemplated becoming a party to the war, I feel sure. We might have had occasion——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask what is the Senator's idea of the present situation with reference to this matter? The President sent his note asking that the belligerent nations state the terms upon which they would be willing to consider the proposition of peace. Germany has replied to that note, and the entente are replying, and perhaps their reply is on the way. What possible good could be accomplished by the adoption of the resolution by the Senate at this time with reference to that note, which simply called for replies which are now upon the way? It will not accelerate the replies, nor will it change them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer the Senator that it is an expression from the Senate of the United States, which is a part of this Government in the conduct of our diplomatic affairs, of an earnest desire that negotiations may continue and that peace may be brought about. To fail to pass the resolution would seem to indicate a lack of interest.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The note of the President is not a note of peace or of mediation, but it distinctly states that aside from that it is simply a request for terms; and the answer to that is now on the way. The answer has been made by Germany. Everyone has his own opinion as to the effect of it, but the answer of Germany is here. The answer of the allies is on the way. Now, what can the Senate do effectively by indorsing a note which has spent its force. The President expressly stated that it was not a peace note nor yet a mediation note, but a note calling for a statement of issues and terms, and those statements and terms, in so far as they are willing to make them, are now on the way or here.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to suggest to him that I have just read the precedent in the case of Japan and Russia. In that case Russia first gave an adverse answer. Her minister of foreign affairs gave an adverse answer that did not satisfy Theodore Roosevelt, and he appealed directly to the Czar. Now, I think the Senator from Idaho would hardly expect that these nations will rush into this opening which we extend. We must make a beginning. We must expect rebuffs on the start.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire to yield until I finish answering at least some of the questions asked or suggestions that have already been made. Later on, if the Senator from Indiana desires to make a suggestion or ask me a question, I shall be glad to hear from him.

Mr. President, these answers from the countries engaged in war are not yet complete. There may be an answer from Germany, and there has been. There may be an answer from the allies on the way; but that does not amount to a final answer. The whole subject is still open. Now, if it is really desirable and if it is really proper for this Nation to express a wish, it certainly is proper for the Senate to do so.

Mr. President, our rights as neutrals, as I stated before, have been disregarded over and over again from each side and by each side. If this war goes on, a continued disregard will come from each. Angered as they are, almost crazed by the terrible struggle in which they are engaged, we can not expect, we know we can not hope for them to regard the rights of neutrals according to rules of international law which heretofore have been accepted as the standards for belligerent conduct.

I think we have done right to protest. At times I have desired our protests even to have gone further than they went—not to the extent of war, however. Nothing has happened during this struggle that I would have been willing to see involve the United States in the war. But, Mr. President, we do not know what is still ahead. The smaller neutral nations and all the neutral nations of the world find the rights of their citizens, and at times the lives of their citizens, involved by this terrible struggle; and I think the neutral nations of the world would be justified in saying to those engaged in war, "We feel that your slaughter has gone far enough. We feel that your disregard of our rights has gone far enough, and we beg you to state your causes of complaint against each other and the terms upon which you would be willing to end the war."

It may be true that the President's letter did not go that far. It may be true that this resolution does not go as far as the view that I have expressed; but this resolution does, at least, express our wish that they may each state the grounds upon which they would be willing to consider peace, and that would be a step toward peace and one from which peace may come. If the letters now on the way decline, I still would be glad to have the Senate express its view upon the subject. I would still be glad to have the neutral nations of the world understand that this part of the Government of the greatest of neutrals declares its desire that each of the contestants should state the terms upon which peace might be made. It comes, and it will go to them, as an expression of our earnest desire, modestly stated, that war may cease. Outside of our rights as neutrals, if we have a spark of love for humanity we must long to see this slaughter cease. Why, in the terrible struggle between the States during our Civil War, there were less than 3,500,000 men enrolled on the two sides. More than that number have died as the result of this war.

Mr. President, I hope that partisanship will be laid aside and that we may unite in at least going as far as this resolution goes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I said yesterday, in expressing the hope that we might consider this resolution with some care, that it was a resolution of extreme importance. I do not think its importance can be exaggerated. It projects Congress—for the resolution is not confined to this body—in the first place into the field of foreign negotiations, which under our Constitution and form of government is reserved to the Executive. It does more than that. It also projects Congress into the field of European politics, and involves us in the affairs of Europe.

Hitherto, Congress has avoided, in accordance with our traditional policy, any steps which would directly involve us in European affairs. Such resolutions as have been passed in regard to events in Europe have been of a general character, usually an expression of sympathy for peoples struggling for their liberties or their independence. This resolution is not of that character, it is not a general resolution in regard to peace. It does not simply say that in the interests of humanity the United States hopes that peace will soon be reached among the belligerents, and that this desolating war will be brought to an early end. Whether or not such a declaration of opinion on the part of Congress would have any effect it is not necessary to discuss; but it would certainly express a sentiment which must be shared by everybody who has any feeling of humanity or any capacity for connected thought.

This resolution goes very much further than that. This resolution commits the Senate, and similar resolutions introduced in the other body commit the House, to the most absolute approval and indorsement of the note of the President. Therefore it is desirable to consider to just what propositions approval of that note would commit Congress and the country. This resolution not only commits us to approval of the President's note but also specifically to demanding of the nations engaged in war on what terms they will make peace. With those terms of peace, as the war is to-day, we have no national or legal concern. The terms of peace, as the war now stands, are wholly beyond and outside our national interests. The ostensible causes of the war—Servia, for example—did not touch the interests of the United States. Such interest as we may have in the terms of peace can only be that of sentiment or of humanity; but legally and nationally we have nothing to do with them. Those who fight the war must make the peace and settle the terms.

It is also to be remembered, Mr. President, that Congress, in acting on a matter of this great seriousness, can not be content with a mere clamor for peace. A peace which meant merely a breathing space until the belligerent nations could gather strength for a fresh struggle, which in all probability when renewed would involve this country, is not a peace which would be worth having. The peace which we desire and must desire, not only for our own selfish interests but in the interests of humanity, must be a just and righteous peace that offers some promise of permanence, and some guaranty that the horrors of the last two years shall not be again poured out upon the world.

Mr. President, before coming to a detailed consideration of the note I wish briefly to trace the policy pursued by our Government under similar conditions.

The right of a neutral country to offer either its good offices or mediation is undoubted. It is discussed and recognized by every writer on international law, from Vattel to the present day. We have a right through the organ of our Government intrusted with that duty—and that is the President—to offer our good offices to bring about peace between warring nations with which we are on friendly terms. That right was explicitly recognized in The Hague Convention, and it was provided there that the offer of good offices by a neutral should not be considered cause of offense by a belligerent. I do not think The Hague provision in any way strengthens the general practice of nations or the law as it now exists. The Hague Conventions have been trampled under foot and utterly disregarded since this war began, and their destruction has been watched with indifference by ourselves and all other neutrals. But the general practice of nations, as I have said, and the recognition of international law, make the right to offer good offices and mediation by a neutral undoubted, and under our form of government the President is the proper authority to make that offer. It must be remembered that, except where mediation is imposed upon belligerents by a more powerful neutral, or by several neutrals, offers of good offices have always followed certain well-recognized lines.

In the first place, it is not to be forgotten that belligerents engaged in active war may, without any breach of friendship or good will, absolutely decline and even resent interference from outside. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the attitude of our Government in regard to mediation during the Civil War:

June 15, 1861, Lord Lyons, British minister, and M. Mercier, French minister at Washington, called on Mr. Seward and proposed each to read an instruction which he had received from his Government and to leave a copy of it if desired. Mr. Seward, before consenting that the papers should be officially communicated to him, inquired as to their contents; and, after inspecting them, he "declined to hear them read, or to receive official notice of them."

He wrote subsequently to Mr. Adams:

The British Government, while declining, out of regard to our natural sensibility, to propose mediation for the settlement of the differences which now unhappily divide the American people, have nevertheless expressed, in a very proper manner, their willingness to undertake the kindly duty of mediation if we should desire it. The President expects you to say on this point to the British Government that we appreciate this generous and friendly demonstration, but that we can not solicit or accept mediation from any, even the most friendly, quarter.

I quote that paragraph from Moore's International Law Digest, but those who are interested will find a much fuller account of the incident in the recently published life of Lord Lyons, and of the interview which he and the French minister had with Mr. Seward.

At a later time Mr. Seward said, in 1862, more than a year later—and this is published in the Life of Charles Francis Adams, by his son of the same name:

If the British Government shall in any way approach you, directly or indirectly, with propositions which assume or contemplate an appeal to the President on the subject of our internal affairs, whether it seems to imply a purpose to dictate or to mediate or to advise, or even to solicit or persuade, you will answer that you are forbidden to debate, to hear, or in any way receive, entertain, or transmit any communication of the kind. You will make the same answer whether the proposition comes from the British Government alone or from that Government in combination with any other. If you are asked for an opinion of what reception the President would give to such a proposition if made here, you will reply that you are not instructed, but that you have no reason for supposing it would be entertained.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to draw the Senator's attention to the great distinction which all writers make between a civil war and a war between independent powers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LODGE. I am permitting.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator will not find a precedent or an authority for the position that the attempt of a neutral to bring about peace between belligerent powers can be resented or regarded as an unfriendly act, and if he will observe the precedents he will see that the exercise of this right—that is, the right of a neutral to intervene——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yielded for a question; I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact, then, that the exercise of this right can never be regarded by either of the parties in dispute as an unfriendly act, and can the Senator point to a case, except a case of civil war or a case of admitted war of conquest, where interference has been or can be resented?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I explicitly said when I began that it was not an unfriendly act. Without pretending to any very profound knowledge, I was aware that the war in this country was what is ordinarily called a civil war. That it was a war between the States, I knew. I also am aware that the present war is not a civil war. But the belligerency of the Confederate States had been recognized; it was recognized at the very beginning by England, and our belligerency, of course, was recognized. I only quoted what Mr. Seward said to show that every nation had the right to decline good offices or mediation, and that we had illustrated that ourselves.

I now come to the Franco-German War. On September 9, 1870, this dispatch went from Mr. Fish to Mr. Bancroft, our minister at Berlin:

Washburne telegraphs—

Mr. Washburne was our minister to France—

Washburne telegraphs that France requests United States to join other powers in effort for peace. Uniform policy and true interest of United States not to join European powers in interference in European questions. President strongly desires to see war arrested and blessings of peace restored. If Germany also desires to have good offices of United States interposed, President will be glad to contribute all aid in his power to secure restoration of peace between the two great powers now at war, and with whom United States has so many traditions of friendship. Ascertain if North Germany desires such offices, but without making the tender thereof unless assured they will be accepted.

FISH.

On September 30 Mr. Fish wrote to Mr. Bancroft:

WASHINGTON, September 30, 1870.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 133, of the 12th instant, has been received.

The reasons which you present against an American intervention between France and Germany are substantially among the considerations which determined the President in the course and policy indicated to you in the cable dispatches from this office on the 9th instant and in rejecting all idea of mediation unless upon the joint request of both the warring powers.

It continues to be the hope of the President, as it is the interest of the people of this country, that the unhappy war in which France and North Germany are engaged shall find an early end.

This Government will not express any opinion as to the terms or conditions upon which a peace may or should be established between two Governments equally sharing its friendship, but it is hoped that the prolongation of the war may not find its cause either in extreme demands on the one side or extreme sensitiveness on the other.

HAMILTON FISH.

The administration of President Grant followed the well-established method of offering good offices or mediation; that is, the first step, and one without which our Government declined to move, was to ask belligerents, those on both sides of the war, whether it would be acceptable. That not being the case, no offer was made; and our Government was careful to point out that they were not concerned in the terms, that their only desire was peace, but that they would not offer their good offices unless both sides desired them to do so.

That was the course pursued by President Roosevelt when he brought the representatives of Japan and Russia together. He did not send that note to Japan and Russia until he had found that it would be agreeable to both. In his Autobiography, on page 583, he says:

I first satisfied myself that each side wished me to act, but that, naturally and properly, each side was exceedingly anxious that the other should not believe that the action was taken on its initiative. I then sent an identical note to the two powers proposing that they should meet, through their representatives, to see if peace could not be made directly between them, and offered to act as an intermediary in bringing about such a meeting, but not for any other purpose. Each assented to my proposal in principle. There was difficulty in getting them to agree on a common meeting place; but each finally abandoned its original contention in the matter, and the representatives of the two nations finally met at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire.

It will be observed that President Roosevelt, following the precedents of our own country and of others, first sounded both sides to the conflict to discover whether his good offices would be acceptable. Having discovered that they would be, he then wrote to Russia and to Japan an identical note proposing that they should meet, not suggesting that we, a neutral power, should take part in the conference, but that they should meet, and, as he said, confining himself to that and to no other purpose. The rest is known.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I ask the Senator if, in the case of President Roosevelt's note, any resolution was introduced into the Senate for a confirmation of his proposal?

Mr. LODGE. I do not remember that any resolution was passed by either House of Congress indorsing and approving the action of the President. The President was acting wholly within his right as Chief Executive, as the present Executive is acting, and it was not sought by him certainly to project the Congress of the United States into the negotiations, if you choose to call them so, or with the good offices he had offered in hopes of bringing the belligerents together.

Now, Mr. President, we are asked to give our full approval to the President's note, which, as I shall proceed to show, goes far beyond any proposition of merely bringing the belligerents together. The President had a perfect right to send that note and to make that experiment. The experiment, as I shall show later, so far as one of the belligerents is concerned, has failed. We have no reason to suppose from reports which come to us that it will have any better success with the other side.

This is the note:

The President of the United States has instructed me to suggest to His Majesty's Government a course of action with regard to the present war which he hopes that the British Government will take under consideration as suggested in the most friendly spirit and as coming not only from a friend but also as coming from the representative of a neutral nation whose interests have been most seriously affected by the war and whose concern for its early conclusion arises out of a manifest necessity to determine how best to safeguard those interests if the war is to continue.

The suggestion which I am instructed to make the President has long had it in mind to offer. He is somewhat embarrassed to offer it at this particular time because it may now seem to have been prompted by a desire to play a part in connection with the recent overtures of the central powers. It has in fact been in no way suggested by them in its origin and the President would have delayed offering it until those overtures had been independently answered but for the fact that it also concerns the question of peace and may best be considered in connection with other proposals which have the same end in view. The President can only beg that his suggestion be considered entirely on its own merits and as if it had been made in other circumstances.

The President suggests that an early occasion be sought to call out from all the nations now at war such an avowal of their respective views as to the terms upon which the war might be concluded and the arrangements which would be deemed satisfactory as a guaranty against its renewal or the kindling of any similar conflict in the future as would make it possible frankly to compare them.

Now, apart from the statement about our own interests, which lies outside of bringing the nations together, the first proposition of the President is to obtain a statement of the terms from all the belligerents:

He is indifferent as to the means taken to accomplish this. He would be happy himself to serve, or even to take the initiative in its accomplishment, in any way that might prove acceptable, but he has no desire to determine the method or the instrumentality. One way will be as acceptable to him as another if only the great object he has in mind be attained.

He takes the liberty of calling attention to the fact that the objects which the statesmen of the belligerents on both sides have in mind in this war are virtually the same, as stated in general terms to their own people and to the world. Each side desires to make the rights and privileges of weak peoples and small States as secure against aggression or denial in the future as the rights and privileges of the great and powerful States now at war.

This, again, seems to be going rather far in stating the views, the objects, and the intention of the people to whom he is offering his good offices:

Each wishes itself to be made secure in the future, along with all other nations and peoples, against the recurrence of wars like this, and against aggression of selfish interference of any kind. Each would be jealous of the formation of any more rival leagues to preserve an uncertain balance of power amidst multiplying suspicions; but each is ready to consider the formation of a league of nations to insure peace and justice throughout the world. Before that final step can be taken, however, each deems it necessary first to settle the issues of the present war upon terms which will certainly safeguard the independence, the territorial integrity, and the political and commercial freedom of the nations involved.

Now, we come to the second request, and that is the measure to be taken for the preservation of the future peace of the world after the war has concluded:

In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or Government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.

I am not going to discuss now the merits of our engaging and associating ourselves with the powers of Europe. I merely point out that it is a departure from the hitherto unbroken policy of this country, a departure so important that it does not seem to me that it ought to be hastily taken. This part of the note does not concern peace; it concerns the future policy of the United States. If carried out, it means an abandonment of the policy we have hitherto pursued of confining ourselves to our own hemisphere and makes us a part of the political system of another hemisphere, with the inevitable corollary that the nations of that other hemisphere will become a part of our system.

But the war must first be concluded. The terms upon which it is to be concluded they are not at liberty to suggest; but the President does feel that it is his right and his duty to point out their intimate interest in its conclusion, lest it should presently be too late to accomplish the greater things which lie beyond its conclusion, lest the situation of neutral nations, now exceedingly hard to endure, be rendered altogether intolerable, and lest, more than all, an injury be done civilization itself which can never be atoned for or repaired.

The President therefore feels altogether justified in suggesting an immediate opportunity for a comparison of views as to the terms which must precede those ultimate arrangements for the peace of the world, which all desire and in which the neutral nations as well as those at war are ready to play their full responsible part. If the contest must continue to proceed toward undefined ends by slow attrition until the one group of belligerents or the other is exhausted, if million after million of human lives must continue to be offered up until on the one side or the other there are no more to offer, if resentments must be kindled that can never cool and despairs engendered from which there can be no recovery, hopes of peace and of the willing concert of free peoples will be rendered vain and idle

The life of the entire world has been profoundly affected. Every part of the great family of mankind has felt the burden and terror of this unprecedented contest of arms. No nation in the civilized world can be said in truth to stand outside its influence or to be safe against its disturbing effects. And yet the concrete objects for which it is being waged have never been definitively stated.

It has not been usual to criticize the people to whom you are offering your good offices, but I dare say that may be perfectly suitable under the new dispensation, although it has not been the habit to do it.

The leaders of the several belligerents have, as has been said, stated those objects in general terms. But, stated in general terms, they seem the same on both sides.

I doubt very much if that would be accepted by the belligerents. I think their objects seem to them, however erroneously, to be different.

Never yet have the authoritative spokesmen of either side avowed the precise objects which would, if attained, satisfy them and their people that the war had been fought out. The world has been left to conjecture what definitive results, what actual exchange of guaranties, what political or territorial changes or readjustments, what stage of military success even, would bring the war to an end.

It may be that peace is nearer than we know; that the terms which the belligerents on the one side and on the other would deem it necessary to insist upon are not so irreconcilable as some have feared; that an interchange of views would clear the way at least for conference and make the permanent concord of the nations a hope of the immediate future, a concert of nations immediately practicable.

The President is not proposing peace; he is not even offering mediation. He is merely proposing that soundings be taken in order that we may learn, the neutral nations with the belligerent, how near the haven of peace may be for which all mankind longs with an intense and increasing longing. He believes that the spirit in which he speaks and the objects which he seeks will be understood by all concerned, and he confidently hopes for a response which will bring a new light into the affairs of the world.

LANSING.

Putting aside the general statement about conditions, we come down to the essential points that are made in the note which we are asked to indorse by this resolution and to commit the country to, so far as we can commit it, from the first word to the last.

It will be observed that the President found it necessary to say that in making his offer at this particular time he was embarrassed in making it, because it might seem to have been prompted by the recent overtures of the central powers; and he assures us that, of course, it had nothing to do with them. Coming at the time it did, however, it was unfortunate in producing a widespread impression to the contrary. Of course, I accept the President's statement absolutely. I mean never to impute motives to anybody, and I have no power to divine intentions. The President says that it was in no way associated with the note of Germany to the other powers, which had just preceded it; but, unfortunately, I repeat, a different interpretation was placed upon it abroad very generally and also here at home. Those who sympathized most warmly with Germany regarded it as friendly and as done at a time when it would help Germany to make peace at the moment and on the terms she desired; and it was regarded in the same way by those whose sympathies were adverse to Germany and in favor of the allies. It could hardly be otherwise, coming at the moment it did.

But, Mr. President, we are not left wholly to conjecture as to what the feeling was. It is an unwritten rule in both Houses—from which I should be the last to deviate and which I have never seen set aside but once—not to refer in debate to the representatives of foreign Government in the United States. The only occasion on which I remember to have seen that rule set aside, and properly set aside, was when a letter written by Mr. Dupuy de Lome, the Spanish minister, came to light, in which he attacked the President and Congress, which led to his voluntary recall by the Spanish Government. That letter was discussed.

I know that in referring to an ambassador I am doing an unusual thing, although I refer with all respect; but it is an unusual circumstance which calls it out, and it is an explanation, perhaps, of why the President's note was so widely misinterpreted as being put forth in the German interest.

On December 24, in the New York Staats Zeitung—I have the original here—was a message from the German ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, from which I quote the two essential paragraphs, which I have translated into English. He says:

> Just as once the Star of Bethlehem led the kings from the East on their long journey through the night in the fulfillment of their hopes, so there now gleams into the darkness of this useless slaughter in Europe out of the words of President Wilson the light of a new message of peace on earth. Germany stands ready to follow it. Confident of her strength, but not boastful, conscious that she drew the sword not through lust of conquest but only in defense of her national existence, she asks no foreign territory, but only assurance against future attack and against alliances which threaten the peace of the world.

It is hardly to be wondered at that after such a statement as this from the German ambassador there should be a general impression or general misinterpretation of the President's note, that there should be a general belief that it was designed and timed so as to help Germany in obtaining peace at the moment she desired it and on the terms she wished to impose.

It is unusual, I think, for an ambassador, so far as my experience goes, to approve or to oppose the utterances and declarations of the President of the United States. Washington demanded the recall of Genet because of his public statements in opposition to the policies of Washington's administration. President Cleveland demanded the recall of a British minister because a private letter of the minister had been published in which he had advocated Mr. Cleveland's election, and the demand was made within 48 hours, I think, after the note had been printed.

Mr. STONE. Did the Senator from Massachusetts say that the British minister had advocated Mr. Cleveland's election?

Mr. LODGE. He spoke favorably of Mr. Cleveland's election in that note to his correspondent in California. I think if the Senator from Missouri will look the matter up he will find I am not mistaken in saying that the letter was favorable to Mr. Cleveland. In the one case, that of President Washington, the minister had spoken in opposition; in the case of Mr. Cleveland he had spoken in favor. Of course, I do not cite these as precedents. The traditions and practices of President Cleveland and Mr. Bayard, I know, are no longer in force, but I think they justify me in saying that this utterance of the German ambassador at this time was unusual, and that I am further justified in citing it as showing why President Wilson's note has been so misinterpreted on the very point which he disclaims. I regard that misinterpretation, which has gone widely over the world, as presenting a very serious objection to our indorsing and approving without a word the President's note.

We have been a neutral in this great war. I think we have all tried—I know I have in my official capacity, whatever my sympathies might be—to preserve both in speech and in action a neutral attitude. Now, it is quite as possible to be unneutral in entering upon negotiations for peace as to be unneutral during the operations of war.

If that misinterpretation of the President's note, owing to the time at which it appeared, and which he thought it necessary to forestall, is so general throughout the world, as I believe it to be, then we are in danger when, without any abatement or any modification, we adopt that note, of saying to the whole world that the Senate of the United States, and, if the House acts, the Congress of the United States, are ranging themselves on the side of one belligerent in seeking to bring about peace favorable to that belligerent.

I do not wish to see this country officially ranged on the side of either belligerent either in war or in peace; but certainly I should not wish through any vote of mine to have my action misinterpreted. I am willing and glad to do anything to promote peace, if neutrality is preserved in seeking it; but I am not willing by interpretation or misinterpretation to have myself ranged by my vote as trying to help one side in the negotiations of peace against the other; and particularly I do not want to be ranged against the side which I personally believe is fighting the battle of freedom and democracy as against military autocracy. I do not wish to be put in that false position. I do not want to be ranged in peace negotiations or to have the country ranged on the side of the allies; I certainly do not want it to be ranged on the side of Germany; and with this widespread misinterpretation, which has gone all over the world as to the note, a misinterpretation so general and probable that the President thought it necessary to anticipate it, I think we should be very slow before we approve and indorse that note without modification or subtraction of any kind.

Mr. President, the next point is the demand for terms. My own belief is that, according to all good practice, the terms must be the work of the belligerent nations, especially when the nation offering its good offices has no national or local interest in the questions involved.

The third point is the suggestion of the President as to what we are to do after the war is over with a view of preventing future wars. That I do not myself misinterpret his purposes there or give them too great extension, I shall ask the privilege of reading to the Senate an article clipped from one of the great Democratic papers of the country, the Louisville Courier-Journal. The article referred to quotes the passage which I have read in the President's note, beginning with the words:

> In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world, the people and the Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. * * * They stand ready and even eager to cooperate—

And so forth; and then says:

> That is plain speaking, whose plain meaning is that if the speaker is to shape the future foreign policy of this country we are to assume a full share of responsibility for the future peace of mankind. It means that we are a world power; that the world's affairs are our affairs; that never again in any great war convulsion shall we be a neutral; that with the coming of peace in Europe will begin our new responsibilities as a guarantor of peace, backed, of course, by our resources in men, money, and arms. It means, indeed, that the President of the United States, in view of the assumption of those responsibilities, would not be averse to having a voice in shaping that peace, if not actually sitting at the council board which shall draw up its terms.

It goes on at some length—I will print the whole of the article without reading—and then says at the end:

> There are resolutions before Congress for the indorsement by that body of this note of the President's. It might be well for Congress before taking that action to go slow enough to be sure of just what it is indorsing.

I now ask that the article from the Louisville Courier-Journal, to which I have referred, may be printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The article in full is as follows:

THE WILSON DOCTRINE—THE PRESIDENT'S NOTE A PUZZLING PROCEEDING—COVERT DECLARATION OF THE FUTURE POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES—NEVER AGAIN A NEUTRAL POWER—A REVOLUTIONARY SUGGESTION TO BE ANSWERED BEFORE INDORSED.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal, Democrat.]

In commenting on the President's note to the belligerent powers the Courier-Journal characterized it as "a puzzling proceeding." It is now evident that it is just that to all the world, for all the world is asking what it means, what's its motive, and the answers to the riddle to be read are almost as many and as diverse as the readers.

But, as the Courier-Journal sees it, the feature of that note of greatest significance is embodied in a paragraph which has escaped particular notice and has nowhere been emphasized by the press by display in distinguishing type or position. That paragraph is this:

"In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and the Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and as ardent as that of any other people or government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command."

That is plain speaking, whose plain meaning is that if the speaker is to shape the future foreign policy of this country we are to assume a full share of responsibility for the future peace of mankind. It means that we are a world power; that the world's affairs are our affairs; that never again in any great war convulsion shall we be a neutral; that with the coming of peace in Europe will begin our new responsibilities as a guarantor of peace, backed, of course, by our resources in men, money, and arms. It means, indeed, that the President of the United States, in view of the assumption of those responsibilities, would not be averse to having a voice in shaping that peace, if not actually sitting at the council board which shall draw up its terms.

DOES THIS ANSWER?

Read again your President's note to the powers, easy-going citizens of our once isolated Republic, and say whether that is a far-fetched answer to its puzzle.

It is an answer which is entirely consistent with Mr. Wilson's known views. Repeatedly within the past year or two he has publicly declared that as a Nation the United States can no longer tread the path its founders marked out for it; that its international relations have become such that new perils and new obligations compel it to take the very path against which the founders so sollcitously warned and guarded. Less than three months ago he was openly proclaiming that this is the last great war that the United States can keep out of, and judging by his explanations of his note to the belligerents, he is not at all confident that it can keep out of this.

The Courier-Journal does not discuss here the new policy on which he would launch this Nation. It merely points to the evidence that he expects to launch it on such a policy, and to the additional fact, made possible by a mistake of the constructors of our constitutional system, that one American who happens to be President can, in the secrecy of his study and the counsel only of his typewriter, go so far as to revolutionize in a single night the character of the Government that has been nearly 150 years in building.

A FAIR INTERPRETATION.

That the foregoing is not a strained interpretation of the President's purpose as indicated by his note is shown by the latest authoritative explanation of the much-explained note, "stated officially for the administration" through the Associated Press. "As to permanent guarantees," says this authorized explanation, "it was officially declared that the United States stands ready to enter any kind of international agreement that may seem most desirable to the nations, whether permanent peace is to be secured by force, if necessary, or by law. The country is not committed to any one plan and President Wilson is entirely open to suggestions. It is the administration view that the country can be committed to an abandonment of the policy of isolation, much as President Monroe committed it to the Monroe doctrine, without Senate action. In the plans so far contemplated, however, it is probable the nations would be bound by treaty agreements which would necessarily have to be ratified by the Senate, so far as the United States is concerned."

Is not the puzzle solved?

Is it not the President's purpose that we shall have a Wilson doctrine, as we have a Monroe doctrine—a Wilson doctrine of far greater scope than the Monroe doctrine; for whereas the latter committed the United States to the regulation of certain affairs in the Americas, the Wilson doctrine would commit us to participation with a strong hand in the regulation of the affairs of the world?

There are resolutions before Congress for the indorsement by that body of this note of the President's. It might be well for Congress before taking that action to go slow enough to be sure of just what it is indorsing.

Mr. LODGE. Let me say also, as I have already pointed out, that it has been the practice to sound belligerents before sending an offer of good offices. That course has been always pursued, and I think it is the general practice of nations. According to the published statement of the representatives of the allies the note came to them as a complete surprise. They were not sounded in any way in regard to it, and I do not know that Germany was; but one side was certainly not sounded. Mr. Lansing says no one was sounded, and this was, of course, a radical departure from the accepted practice in offering either mediation or good offices.

Mr. President, there is a good deal of subsequent history attached to the President's note. When we indorse that note in this general and sweeping way and approve it without any reservation whatever, it is well to know just what it means and what official glosses have been put upon it. It appeared on December 21, and early on that same day it received its first explanation by the Secretary of State, which was as follows:

The reasons for the sending of the note were as follows:

"It isn't our material interest we had in mind when the note was sent, but more and more our own rights are becoming involved by the belligerents on both sides, so that the situation is becoming increasingly critical.

"I mean by that, that we are drawing nearer the verge of war ourselves, and, therefore, we are entitled to know exactly what each belligerent seeks in order that we may regulate our conduct in the future.

"No nation has been sounded. No consideration of the German overtures or of the speech of Lloyd-George was taken into account in the formulation of the document. The only thing the overtures did was to delay it a few days. It was not decided to send it until Monday. Of course, the difficulties that faced the President were that it might be construed as a movement toward peace and in aid of the German overtures. He specifically denies that that was the fact in the document itself.

"The sending of this note will indicate the possibility of our being forced into the war. That possibility ought to serve as a restraining and sobering force, safeguarding American rights. It may also serve to force an earlier conclusion of the war. Neither the President nor myself regards this note as a peace note. It is merely an effort to get the belligerents to define the end for which they are fighting."

This appeared almost immediately after the President's note. If it had any purpose—and I believe it had, for Mr. Lansing is a most accomplished international lawyer; he is a man of discretion; he certainly would not have made this statement without purpose and without approbation from the Executive—if that statement is correct, and interprets the note aright, then the whole note becomes perfectly simple. By putting it on the ground that our own interests are involved, that we are on the verge of war, we are at once justified in sending that note to the belligerents without notice beforehand, without sounding them. I do not know, but I assume, that this statement before it appeared in the newspapers was made in those precise terms to every one of the foreign nations, belligerent and neutral, in order to explain to them why the so-called peace note was sent. If it was a note of mediation and of good offices, the belligerents should have been notified, and we should have kept ourselves within the well-defined lines which offers of good offices always observe. But if the purpose of the note was to say to the world, "We have a direct national interest in this question, because we foresee that in the continuance of war we shall be brought to the verge of hostilities, if not engaged in them," then that note is justified in form and substance from beginning to end, except, of course, the portion which relates to our conduct after the war.

That was the first statement.

Almost immediately, the same evening, in fact, the second explanation appeared, also from Secretary Lansing:

I have learned from several quarters that a wrong impression was made by the statement which I made this morning, and I wish to correct that impression.

My intention was to suggest the very direct and necessary interest which this country as one of the neutral nations has in the possible terms which the belligerents may have in mind, and I did not intend to intimate that the Government was considering any change in its policy of neutrality, which it has consistently pursued in the face of constantly increasing difficulties.

I regret that my words were open to any other construction, as I now realize that they were. I think that the whole tone and language of the note to the belligerents shows the purpose without further comment on my part. It is needless to say that I am unreservedly in support of that purpose and hope to see it accomplished.

How far that changes the character or meaning of the first explanation I leave it to others more ingenious than I am to determine.

On the 24th of December there was given out the following official statement:

This outline, and what follows, was stated officially yesterday for the administration.

It is the third explanation of the note. Mr. Lansing's name is not attached to it; but the Associated Press and all the press so far as I saw said that it was an official utterance, and it certainly reads as if it were a carefully prepared statement:

This Government does not know, and feels that it has had no real means of knowing, what terms would be required by each of the belligerents to make peace. It regards the recent speeches of the leading statesmen in all countries as vague and undefined and sees nothing in them that would enable a conference to draw up a treaty.

All speak of the rights of small nations, the repugnance of conquest, and the guaranties of a permanent peace, but no one nation has yet gone into what it means by those phrases in a way that the Government of the United States can understand.

Recent press comment has been taken to enhance that vagueness. France, for instance, has not disclosed if what she considers a just peace means the evacuation of her northern Provinces; or, in addition to that, the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine; or if in addition to both those claims she expects a money indemnity for the damage of invasion; or, beyond that, if she has an actual program for doing away with so-called German militarism. In short, the United States asks what would she accept to-day as the basis of peace.

Similar issues apply to all the belligerent countries in merely a varying form. What President Wilson wants is the details. As the largest neutral facing grave problems and as the friend of all parties concerned, the United States feels most earnestly that it is entitled to know those facts. Unless some one of the groups lays down its actual terms there will be no basis for negotiation and no possibility of peace till the world is bled white, officials declare.

There is not the slightest expectation here that the terms laid down will be reconcilable at first. It is known that some of the nations will demand what in actuality is impossible. Nevertheless, the naming of those terms will afford a basis of negotiation, a starting place from which the conflicting interests can begin to converge.

Nor is any embarrassment seen to any of the nations in naming such terms. It is understood in advance that they are apt to fluctuate with the military changes and are not permanently binding under new conditions. Whatever any nation feels must be included in its terms, for moral reasons can also be added to the terms without embarrassment it is said.

As to permanent guaranties, it was officially declared that the United States stands ready to enter any kind of international agreement that may seem most desirable to the nations, whether permanent peace is to be secured by force, if necessary, or by law. The country is not committed to any one plan, and President Wilson is entirely open to suggestions. It is the administration view that the country can be committed to an abandonment of the policy of isolation, much as President Monroe committed it to the Monroe doctrine, without Senate action. In the plans so far contemplated, however, it is probable the nations would be bound by treaty agreements which would necessarily have to be ratified by the Senate, so far as the United States is concerned.

Then there are further explanations, which I will ask to have printed, if there be no objection—the rest of the article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A fuller understanding of the embarrassment caused to the administration by the coincidence of its note with the German proposals was given yesterday, when it was said that, despite the early unfavorable effect which the note was expected to have in the allied countries through the that fact, it was decided to risk it in view of the greater interests involved. It is expected it may be some time before the American viewpoint will be accepted abroad, but it is felt that in the end it certainly will prevail.

NOT AIMED AT LLOYD-GEORGE.

It also stated most emphatically that the note was not rushed off Monday in order to get it to Premier Lloyd-George before he had irrevocably committed the allies against peace in his speech to Parliament Tuesday. That assumption was foreseen, but officials expect it to lose weight and importance as the first impressions wear off.

The early resentment in London and Paris on the assumption that the President's note declared both belligerents were fighting for the same object is regarded as unwarranted at the State Department, where it was said great pains had been taken to avoid that very inference.

Stress was laid on the President's words to show that he had not expressed any conviction that both sets of belligerents were fighting for the same objects. On the other hand, the language of the note, it was pointed out, specifically said the statesmen of both groups of belligerents had so stated their objects in general terms to the people of their own countries. Officials were gratified to see this view being pointed out in some of the later foreign comment received.

VAGUENESS HAS INCREASED.

The phrase was written, it was said, after study of the more recent statements of the belligerents rather than the statements at the time they entered the war. Then the avowed objects of all he nations were more specific, Italy, for instance, coming into the war with an official statement of what she felt necessary for her future. Since then, however, on all sides, it is felt a constantly increasing vagueness has been growing up, which now is expanding into the most nebulous terms.

General hostility to the note, at first, both in allied and Teutonic countries, as conveyed in news dispatches, was regarded by officials as one of the most hopeful signs, as it indicated that the note was neutral. Especially was the hostility in some of the German papers pleasing, as it was thought that when the allies realized that the plan was not so welcome to their enemies they would give to it more earnest and more impartial consideration.

EARLY REPLY NOT EXPECTED.

The possibility of an early reply is discounted here. The central powers have indicated that they will not risk laying down their peace terms until they have had a reply to their own proposals from the entente. While the reply now is finished, it will take a week to distribute it to the various powers.

The entente, having both that reply and the President's note to consider, and consisting of 10 different nations, all with different interests, is expected to require considerable time to get its views into shape for transmission.

The allies' reply to the central powers will not be made public here.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that this is the third explanation of the note issuing from official headquarters. They have reviewed it and explained it, and they have particularly laid stress on the United States entering any kind of international agreement, to which I have already called attention, and they bring up the Monroe doctrine. It is stated here:

It is the administration view that the country can be committed to an abandonment of the policy of isolation, much as President Monroe committed it to the Monroe doctrine, without Senate action.

President Monroe committed his administration to that doctrine when he sent in that message. He committed nobody else.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts I feel absolutely sure that the President does not agree to the view that the Government or the Nation could be committed to the policy indicated without Senate action.

Mr. LODGE. Then he should not allow the Associated Press and all the press of the country to come out with an uncontradicted official statement, repeated over and over again.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure that the President approves no such publication, had nothing to do with it, and approves no such view.

Mr. LODGE. I am delighted to hear it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I state that in my place with absolute knowledge of what I say.

Mr. LODGE. I am delighted to know that the Senator makes that statement on his own authority.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad to know that the President—who is certainly as familiar as any living man with the history of his country—knows that President Monroe could not commit anybody but himself and his administration. The Monroe doctrine has become part of the policy of the United States because it has received the repeated approval of Congress and of the people of the United States. It is not a treaty. It is not binding. It is a policy to which this country is deeply committed in every way in which a country can be committed; but the country committed itself to the doctrine laid down by President Monroe, and I hope it will be a long day before that doctrine is impaired or abandoned.

Mr. President, that interpretation of the note may be mistaken, but there can be no mistake about the note itself:

In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or Government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.

I am not now attacking the merits of that policy. I am only saying at this time that it is a question of very great moment. The world is aware—those who have given any attention to the subject and those who are anxious, as we all are, to promote and maintain peace—that the limit of voluntary arbitration has been reached. Elsewhere, on other occasions, I have said that, and have gone into the question at some length. The only way in which the settlement of disputed questions between nations can be carried further, the limit of voluntary arbitration having been reached, is by putting behind the decision of the international tribunals force to compel the acceptance of the decisions of those tribunals as the force of the United States stands behind the courts of the United States and compels the acceptance of their decisions.

That next step is charged with difficulties, as I have pointed out. Great obstacles arise. It may be possible that something can be done in that direction to remove causes of war, to promote the cause of peace; but the difficulties and the obstacles can not be overlooked. If we make the attempt too sweeping and pledge ourselves to too much, it will break down just as surely as all these empty treaties about a year's delay, and so forth, would break down under the stress of war and the danger of the country. Whatever we do in that direction, if anything is possible—which I very much doubt—must be done with the utmost care. Above all nothing of the sort should be urged or pressed now before the conclusion of the present war. As is said in that statement, this movement would involve treaties. Cooperation in everything, the submission of all possible questions to arbitration with the force of the Governments of the world behind it—how far is that to go? Is it to include the Monroe doctrine? Is it to include the sovereign right to admit and exclude whomever we please from immigration to this country? Where is the line to be drawn? Those are some of the questions which are opened up by this sweeping proposition of cooperation with other nations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to know if the Senator will yield to permit me to ask unanimous consent to have this resolution go over until to-morrow? The morning hour is about to close.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I have not quite concluded, but I am perfectly willing to let it go over. I want the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to get his bill up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, I ask that this matter may go over until to-morrow, retaining its privileged character.

Mr. LODGE. I should like it understood that I can have the floor to-morrow to complete what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not rise to object, but before the unfinished business is laid before the Senate I submit a proposed substitute for the resolution now under consideration. The substitute ought to be supported by every Senator on both sides of the Chamber. I ask that it be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read and ordered printed.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, in the interests of humanity and civilization, expresses the sincere hope that peace between the warring nations of Europe may be consummated at an early day.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 3, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast ever been, our Refuge and our Strength, Life of our life, Father of our souls, lead Thou us on unto the perfect day by the inspiration of faith, the hope of the heart, the forward look of love with its keen perceptions of the things eternal; that as individuals and as a Nation we may continue to grow intellectually, morally, spiritually until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; and songs of praises we will ever give to Thee; in His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Owing to my election to a place on the Committee on Naval Affairs, I herewith tender to the House my resignation from the following committees: Indian Affairs, Arts and Expositions, Patents and Copyrights, and Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.

Respectfully, W. W. VENABLE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HEATON, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week on account of death in the family.

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina, the distinguished Democratic leader [Mr. KITCHIN], is absent. I ask unanimous consent for a few minutes to make a speech touching an important matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that only five days remain of the time allotted to the so-called Newlands committee to investigate and report to Congress. On a former occasion I explained to the House the impossibility of making the investigation and the report and doing justice to it within the time limited. It is very important that the committee having begun the work and carried it as far as we have we should finish it up. We have heard practically one side of the case, the railroad side, if you can call it one side, but one view of the case, and I think it exceedingly important that the whole case be heard. It will probably require 30 or 40 more working days to do it. I think it important that at a very early day the House consider whether or not it will make the extension asked for in a joint resolution pending in the House. I do not know whether it is the pleasure of the House, this being Calendar Wednesday, to take it up now, but if objection is made to its being considered to-day, I hope that I may have it considered to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. ADAMSON. My request is, Mr. Speaker, that it be taken up now, if the Speaker will submit the question.

The SPEAKER. On account of the pressing necessities of the occasion, the Chair is inclined to submit the gentleman's request. If the gentleman from Georgia will consent to withdraw it in case a wrangle ensues over it the Chair will submit the question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will do that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 323.

Joint resolution to amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee, approved July 20, 1916.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the resolution be reported.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That S. J. Res. 60 (Public Res. No. 25, 64th Cong.), approved July 20, 1916, entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through a joint subcommittee to consist of five Senators and five Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, be, and they hereby are, appointed to investigate the subject of the Government control of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce; also the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, wireless, cable, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership, of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and operation, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress and with power to summon witnesses, to administer oaths, and to require the various departments, commissions, and other Government agencies of the United States to furnish such information and render such assistance as may, in the judgment of the joint subcommittee, be deemed desirable; to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject and report to Congress on or before the second Monday in January, 1918. When the members of said joint subcommittee have been selected and the said joint subcommittee has organized and commenced work the present Representatives from the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall continue to serve on said committee, notwithstanding the investigation may extend over the expiration of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and if any member of said subcommittee, Senator or Representative, shall cease to be a Member of Congress he is hereby authorized to continue to serve as a member of the said joint subcommittee, which shall fix reasonable and adequate compensation and pay him for such service as he may render after ceasing to be a Senator or Representative. That if a vacancy should occur on said subcommittee when Congress is not in session the chairman of the committee from which the retiring Member was selected at the time of his selection or the Representative or Senator ranking next to such chairman shall select another member of such committee to fill the vacancy. That the joint subcommittee may fix and pay appropriate compensation to its employees in addition to any salary received from any committee of Congress or from the United States in any capacity. That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said subcommittee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such subcommittee."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. I object.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a privileged resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 429) providing for an investigation into certain charges made by Thomas W. Lawson.

Whereas Thomas W. Lawson, of Boston, gave to the public a statement which appears in the daily newspapers under date of December 28 and 29, 1916, in which he says, amongst other things, that "If it was actually believed in Washington there was to be a real investigation of last week's leak, there would not be a quorum in either the Senate or House next Monday, and a shifting of bank accounts similar to those in the good old sugar-investigation days," and in another statement, which appears in the daily press of December 31, 1916, he says, "The good old Capitol has been wallowing in Wall Street leak grafts for 40 years, wallowing hale and hearty"; and

Whereas the statements of the aforesaid Thomas W. Lawson, and each of them, affect the dignity of this House and the integrity of its proceedings and the honesty of its Members:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of five Members of the House and that such committee be instructed to inquire into the charges made by the aforesaid Thomas W. Lawson, and for such purposes it shall have the power to send for persons and papers and enforce their appearance before said committee, and to administer oaths, and shall have the right to make report at any time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Upon that, Mr. Speaker, we want to be heard.

Mr. GARRETT. In the first place, it is Calendar Wednesday and nothing can come up except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARDNER. I would like to be heard on that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear all gentlemen.

Mr. GARRETT. In the next place, it does not present a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. GARRETT. In what way does it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is asking the gentleman why it does not.

Mr. GARRETT. Is every loose charge that can be made by anybody living on earth to be considered a question of personal privilege unless directed to some Member of the House? In what way is it a question of personal privilege? Not a Member is mentioned in it.

Mr. BENNET. It is a question of the privilege of the House.

Mr. MANN. It is of the highest privilege.

Mr. BENNET. It is higher than a personal privilege.

Mr. BUTLER. It involves the whole membership.

Mr. GARRETT. In what way does a resolution of this sort have the right to come up on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. If this resolution is privileged at all, it is a privilege of the House. Rule IX of the House Rules provides:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members, individually, in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT. Then it is the opinion of the Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear anyone on the other side, if the gentleman from Tennessee has concluded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if these charges do not affect the dignity of the House or the integrity of its proceedings, I can not imagine any charges which would. Here is the direct charge made publicly by a man of prominence that the House Members are so engaged in stock manipulation through secret information which could only be obtained officially, that you can not get a quorum of the House together if there is to be an investigation. There can be no question that it affects both the dignity of the House and the integrity of its proceedings.

The SPEAKER. Unless some other gentleman desires to be heard, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois assumes that this resolution recites facts that it does not contain. There is no statement in the resolution that Members have been guilty of misconduct in which they could engage only as a result of information obtained in an official capacity. There is a statement which appears in the public press that some person has asserted that if a proposed investigation were made of certain transactions upon a stock exchange, a quorum of either House could not be obtained. I do not think that so preposterous, so ridiculous, so absurd, and notoriety-seeking a statement as that can be construed by Members in their serious senses as a reflection upon this body. It is so palpably, so notoriously, and so outrageously false, without foundation in fact, that it can not be assumed that we must take notice of it or of every other scandalmonger in the United States who is seeking notoriety at the expense of Members of this body. We owe something to ourselves and to the dignity of the House, and we ought not to elevate and magnify and advertise everyone who tries to throw mud without the slightest justification for his accusation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the truth were known, if there be any leaks in the State Department, because of his assumed familiarity, it could only have been known by him because of his connection at some time, recent or remote, with them. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that the statements are falsely scandalous and consist in the throwing of mud. At whom?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know—not at me.

Mr. MANN. At the Members of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily.

Mr. MANN. If it is not throwing mud at the Members of the House at whom is it throwing mud, and if it is throwing mud at the Members of the House, that is a question of the highest privilege. The gentleman is arguing the merits of the proposition and not whether this is a question of privilege. Of course, if the House desires to vote down the proposition, that is another question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not yet come to that point. That can be discussed later.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman was arguing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not intend to be scared off my feet by either the gentleman from Boston or the gentleman from Chicago. If this resolution comes to the House I am willing to vote to refer it to the Committee on Rules, where it belongs.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman not think that this is a charge directly against the individual Members when Mr. Lawson, a man known all over this country, having a national and international reputation——

Mr. FITZGERALD. As a stock manipulator.

Mr. EMERSON. It does not make any difference about that, for people pay a great deal of attention to what he says. He makes an accusation that if the truth were known about this leak we would not have a quorum here in the House of Representatives. I think we owe it to ourselves and to the country to pass this resolution.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio says that people pay some attention to what Mr. Lawson says. Does he know of a single widow in the United States who has paid any attention to anything that he has ever said concerning a stock transaction that was not trimmed?

Mr. EMERSON. It does not make any difference about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the only question of privilege that has ever been held in order, if I recall correctly, on Calendar Wednesday was a question that was asserted to be in order because of some constitutional prerogative, something outside of the rules of the House.

The rules of the House control its business, and on Calendar Wednesday the rule provides that immediately after the approval of the Journal the Speaker shall call the committees. The House did on two occasions pass upon what questions of privilege were in order on Calendar Wednesday. It held at one time that a question supposed to be privileged because of the constitutional provision that the census should be taken every 10 years was not privileged or was privileged—was not privileged, I believe.

Mr. MANN. That had nothing to do with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It had. The matter first came up on Calendar Wednesday, and the House declined to consider it on Calendar Wednesday because it was not in order and then afterwards it held differently on another day.

Mr. MANN. The question was whether or not it was privileged.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; it first came up on Calendar Wednesday. The House held that it could not be considered on Calendar Wednesday, but could be considered on another day.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from New York to the language of the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Read it to the Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT. The quotation contained in the resolution is this, reported to come from Mr. Lawson:

If it was actually believed in Washington that there was to be a real investigation of last week's leak, there would not be a quorum in either the Senate or House next Monday, and a shifting of bank accounts similar to those in the good old sugar-investigation days.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I want to ask the gentleman from New York to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana how that language is a possible reflection on the House? It does not say if it is believed in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I saw another statement coupled with that which shows what was in the mind of the gentleman, and that was, he believed there was one man in the United States who could make a real investigation. There was some doubt as to whether he meant the President of the United States or himself. But it seems to me the manner in which this resolution is worded does not raise the question of privilege respecting the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose this statement had said "the gentleman from New York," or "the gentleman from Maine," or "the gentleman from Ohio"—myself—"would not be present to make up a quorum on that occasion," does he not think that would present a question of personal privilege?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It depends on the manner in which it was said.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As it was said in the words quoted in the resolution, if it reflected on either the gentleman from New York or myself?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not say it would reflect on me. The gentleman from Ohio can speak for himself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I quoted two gentlemen of the highest virtue that I could think of at the moment.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is a reflection on the rest of us.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] desire to be heard?

Mr. GARDNER. Not if the Chair is ready to rule.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] desire to be heard?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, Mr. Speaker; for a moment.

Unfortunately, whenever a decision is based upon a question of this kind it becomes more or less a precedent. The question before the House now is whether or not this is a reflection upon the House in general. The rule—and I will ask the privilege of reading it again—is as follows:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to adjourn.

Now, in the precedents that are stated following this rule we have the following notes given in the Manual and Digest:

The privilege of the House—

And I understand them to be under consideration in this resolution—

the privilege of the House, as distinguished from that of the individual Member, includes questions relating to its constitutional prerogatives, in respect to revenue legislation and appropriations, including revenue and other treaties; its power to punish for contempt, whether of its own Members, of witnesses who are summoned to give information, or of other persons; questions relating to its organization, and the title of its Members to their seats, including various questions incidental thereto.

I cite these—and the others are all alike—for the purpose of showing that newspaper statements such as this can not possibly be considered as within this rule. Suppose it should be said in some newspaper here in Washington that if a certain vote came up on a particular day one-half of the Members would be absent on that occasion because they would not dare to vote upon it, would that be within the rule? Certainly not. We are continually hearing and seeing statements of that kind made, and a great deal worse than that, and it is not, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], applicable to individual Members, because individual Members are not specified. They must be stated so that they can be identified.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that a Washington newspaper should state that on a certain vote coming up half the Members would be absent because they had been bribed, or from any other corrupt motive, would that be a matter of privilege?

Mr. GARRETT. The language quoted does not say that.

Mr. MANN. I think it does. It is my reading of the language of Lawson—that it is corrupt.

Mr. TOWNER. I still say that I doubt whether that will be a reflection on the House sufficient to warrant such proceedings.

Mr. MANN. He states he would be absent because afraid to vote.

Mr. TOWNER. I could imagine a great many imputations that might be indulged that would not be within the rule. I deprecate as much as any individual Member of the House these statements of the newspapers. But I entirely agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] when he says that by our taking such action as is urged to-day we dignify them and give them character and make them seem as if they were important in the eyes of the people of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose it was added that gentlemen of this House would not be present to vote upon a measure to be submitted until they had changed or altered their bank accounts. Would that be a reflection on the Members of the House? I ask the gentleman from Iowa now to consider all the statements that were made by Mr. Lawson.

Mr. TOWNER. The reason that statements of that character are not within the rule is that they are general, they do not particularize.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY. Would it be in order to refer this resolution at this time?

The SPEAKER. You can not take a Member off his feet. As soon as this question of order is closed up; yes.

Mr. HENRY. I wanted to move to refer it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, there has never been, so far as I know, any instance in which the House of Representatives has ever taken any action such as it is here asked to do upon newspaper statements of this general character, statements such as those that are here made; and it occurs to me that if we now make it a precedent we will bring before the House a continual consideration of resolutions of this character.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman familiar with the proceeding that initiated the famous Michael Mulhall investigation, in which he made charges against particular Members of the House, of different character from these only in respect to the fact that these charges are being made generally instead of against individual Members?

Mr. TOWNER. I am arguing to the Speaker now that this is a vastly different proposition when it applies generally, with indiscriminate and sweeping statements which can not be identified. I admit that if these charges were made against individual Members and stated so that they could be identified in any way a different rule would apply.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Are not the charges individual?

Mr. TOWNER. No; because a direct answer can not be made to them.

Mr. EMERSON. It is a direct charge against every Member of this House.

Mr. TOWNER. If the newspapers should say this House was too ignorant to consider a resolution or a bill, that would be a charge against every Member of this House, and certainly it would not be within the rules and precedents.

Mr. EMERSON. Does not the gentleman admit that an accusation which is believed by nine-tenths of the people of this country should be investigated?

Mr. TOWNER. My belief is that it is exactly opposite. I do not think 10 per cent of the people of the country believe it. Coming from the source it has come from, it is utterly discredited in the eyes of the people of the United States, and I should think it entirely unworthy of the House to take action on this resolution.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has taken his seat, but he is up again.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether, if 10 per cent of the people of this country do believe that there has been improper action on the part of this House, or of any considerable number of Members of this House, he thinks that it should not warrant an investigation to disclose the truth of it?

Mr. TOWNER. Under some circumstances it could be justified; in others not. In this case I do not believe it is warranted under the precedents.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I rise to discuss the question whether or not it is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of whether or not 5 per cent or 10 per cent or 3 per cent of the people of the United States believe the vaporings of Mr. Thomas W. Lawson. The question is whether or not this is or is not a privileged question. We are not entirely without precedents on this proposition. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker and the attention of the House to section 2705 of Hinds' Precedents, on page 1145 of volume 3, where it is stated:

A newspaper article charging Members of the House generally with abuse of the franking privilege was held to involve a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman who rendered that opinion?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That opinion was rendered by Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Well, go on.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it was rendered by Mr. Speaker CANNON in the Sims case. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to another precedent, section 2709, on page 1147 of volume 3, of Hinds' Precedents:

A newspaper allegation that a certain number of Representatives, whose names were not given, had entered into a corrupt speculation was held to involve a question of privilege.

The charge made here is that so many of the Members of this House were engaged in this speculation and profited by reason of this leak, that if an investigation was had there would not be a sufficient number of Members either of the House or of the Senate present on Monday to constitute a quorum. In addition to that, it further charges corruption by stating that the ill-gotten gains from the transaction would be transferred from the present bank accounts to some hidden bank accounts. Every Member of this House is charged directly—not specifically, but directly—with corruption. His honesty is impugned. The integrity of this House is impugned—not only its individual Members but the integrity of the House is impugned, and challenged before the people of the United States.

And as to the merits of this question, there are plenty of facts to warrant this investigation, but I choose not now to argue the merits of this proposition, but submit, Mr. Speaker, that the precedents are numerous where the charges are not so direct and culpable as the charge in this instance.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. I ask the question with a view to withdrawing the point of order. If the gentleman now states upon his responsibility as a Member that there are plenty of facts to justify this investigation, and will give to the House some intimation of it, I shall be glad to withdraw the point of order. I want something from a responsible source.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman, who asked me a fair question and in good faith, whether or not I have plenty of facts to warrant investigation, that different minds might form different conclusions as to the sufficiency of the facts I might present, depending upon the prejudice or want of prejudice in such case. That I have facts to warrant an investigation, I will say to the gentleman I am quite sure, and that there are means of ascertaining further facts as to whether these charges are false I am equally sure if the proper machinery is put in motion. I say again that I have facts which I believe will warrant this body in believing that an investigation should be had, not only for the protection of this House but for the protection of its esteem throughout the country.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not ask the gentleman now to mention names, but has the gentleman facts in his possession that he believes will reflect on any Member of the House in connection with the speculation——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No, sir; I have no facts that I believe will reflect upon any Member of the House; but in order that this House may not be accused before the people of the United States because of its silence I ask that this investigation be had.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To discuss the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

MANY MEMBERS. "Rule!" "Rule!"

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to make just one observation. The language quoted in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana is general in its character, and it is at most nothing more than the expression of the personal opinion of an individual, without a single recitation of anything that even looks like a fact contained in the charge.

Mr. Speaker, if that be a privileged resolution, there is not a day in the year on which gentlemen could not arise and present similar resolutions, quoting as a basis the language of publications, daily, weekly, semiweekly, magazines, and every other kind. It does seem to me that before a resolution should be taken seriously, before this body should commit itself to the idea that it is under suspicion, there ought at least to be somewhere an allegation of fact to back up the proposition of privilege.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Men express their opinions——

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman discussing the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT. I am trying to. It does seem to me that in order to make a matter privileged, as presenting a reflection upon the House, or upon any individual Member of the House, there ought to be something more than an expression of opinion about the House or about the individual Member. There ought to be an allegation of fact about the House as a whole or about the individual Member.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is not the gentleman aware that this language would be libelous as a matter of law?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I do not think it would be libelous at all. In what way would it be libelous? Why, Mr. Speaker, there are men in every congressional district in the United States who express their opinions touching individual Members representing particular districts, and those opinions would not be complimentary to the Members; but would any man for a moment be so absurd as to arise and demand an investigation because some political enemy of his had expressed an opinion adverse to him without making a single allegation of fact? There is no allegation of fact contained in the language quoted in the resolution offered by the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is there not after all an allegation of fact? Here is an expert who declares that Members of this body——

Mr. GARRETT. An expert on what?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. On the stock exchange, and he is recognized as knowing something about it, and he says that Members of this body have made large sums of money and are endeavoring to put their ill-gotten gains out of sight. That sounds like a charge, does it not? It seems specific, does it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It sounds like it, without being so.

Mr. GARRETT. He does not say so. He ingeniously uses language apparently for the purpose of—well, I will not say what—and I am extremely sorry that gentlemen of such great intelligence, as are some of the proponents and backers of this resolution, seem disposed to aid or attempt to aid in a sensational matter of this sort.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think after all that Lawson's reputation is quite as good as Mulhall's?

Mr. GARRETT. I do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. We ordered an investigation on Mulhall's charges as a privileged matter.

Mr. GARRETT. We did, Mr. Speaker, and I was the chairman of that special committee. We did order it, but contained in those charges were specific allegations touching seven Members of this House.

Mr. HOUSTON. And calling names.

Mr. GARRETT. And calling them by name, reflecting as they conceived upon their honor and integrity; and it was upon that basis, and for that reason, that the House consented to order that investigation.

The point of order which I make is that this resolution does not present a question of privilege, because the language quoted as its basis is merely the expression of a personal opinion by somebody outside, backed up by no allegation of fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give me a moment for a word in connection with the ruling——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin desires to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I desire to refresh the memory of the Speaker on his ruling on the Mulhall investigation, for the convenience of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in a minute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this question has been ruled upon by a very distinguished Speaker, one who was always very jealous of the dignity of the House, and one who was held in very high esteem by gentlemen upon the other side of the House.

On July 31, 1890, Mr. Speaker Reed made a very notable ruling. The paragraph is headed—

A newspaper article vaguely charging Members of Congress generally with corruption may not be brought before the House as involving a question of privilege.

This resolution was submitted to the House:

Whereas in the National Economist of July 26, 1890, a newspaper publication known as the official organ of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, and which has a wide circulation, the following editorial appears on page 305, to wit: "The bond owners are now happy; they have won the fight, and the bonds they now hold are payable, principal, interest, and premium, in gold only. It would be interesting to know just how many millions it took to force this bill through Congress. Men in these days of corruption and trickery do not change their avowed beliefs and betray their constituencies without a consideration. It will now be in order to placate those whom they have so wickedly betrayed"; and

Whereas the said editorial charges that a measure has been passed through Congress by bribery and the corruption of its Members, the integrity of this House and the rights of the people alike demand that the truth or falsehood of the charge shall be known and dealt with as it deserves.

Then there was a resolution providing for a committee of seven Members to investigate. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, since Speaker of the House for four terms, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged, and after debate Mr. HINDS's Digest shows that Speaker Reed sustained the point of order on the following grounds:

Whether this is or is not a question of privilege does not in the slightest degree prevent its being brought before the House at the proper time; for, even if it is not a question of privilege, any Member has a right to present a resolution and have it referred to the proper committee for examination. But the question whether this is a matter of privilege or not is one which concerns the transactions of business in the House.

It is not always easy to determine the line of demarcation between matters which are questions of privilege and matters which are not. Still there are questions which are very plainly on the one side of the line, and the Chair thinks this is one of them. Here is a newspaper paragraph of the very vaguest character, which makes no assertion except by implication, which makes no statement upon which anybody can be expected to predicate a belief or a conviction. That paragraph is brought before the House, and it is proposed to stop the business of the House until a committee of investigation is ordered. No gentleman on the floor, notwithstanding the number that have spoken, has in any way made himself responsible for the paragraph by expressing the slightest confidence or belief in its statements or by giving any indication that there can be any testimony produced which would have a tendency to prove either the truth or the falsity of the insinuation there made.

Now, it is within the knowledge of every Member of this House that there must be floating about at this time, as there probably have been at any time within the last 10 or 20 years, paragraphs of the same kind and character almost without number; but the House will at once see the inconvenience that would result to the transaction of its business if any Member had the right at any time, upon the production of a newspaper paragraph like this, to demand that we should proceed to investigate it to the exclusion of other business. It seems very clear to the Chair that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that there should be an investigation of the matters that have been discussed by Mr. Lawson and in the public prints relative to the profit making of individuals, either connected with or not connected with the Government, by operations in the stock market upon information obtained in advance from the Department of State. That is not the question at this time. If there be a belief or any justification for the belief that there should be such an investigation, the matter should be presented and taken up by a committee with a report to this House, so that when it acts it will act with definite knowledge whether it is doing the proper thing. If the House is to precipitate an investigation in order to convince the country that its Members are honest, that its proceedings are straightforward, that its conduct is above reproach, every time some skillful advertising, notoriety-seeking, semipublic man undertakes to indulge in a general slur on its Members, the House will be occupied in making such investigations and in doing nothing else, because it is unfortunately true that there are sufficient persons of the character mentioned who would be only too willing to obtain the nortoriety and advertising that such investigations afford.

I am one of those who believe the House should be sensitive as to assaults upon its integrity or charges against its Members, but I do not believe that it should be hastened pell mell into an investigation without that deliberate procedure after preliminary examination and report by a committee that would convey a moral conviction that it is acting not because of fear but in the discharge of a high and important duty.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. While Mr. Lawson was in the city yesterday why did not the committee bring him before it, place him under oath, and ask him these questions and save all this trouble?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not speak for the committee and I do not know why it did or did not do certain things. I do not know whether the resolution was before the committee, or whether any resolution had been introduced so that the committee was in a position to act. The Committee on Rules can not initiate an investigation. Unless there be a resolution before it, it has no authority to act or initiate one.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That committee, unless there be a resolution before it, is not in a position to act. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas, he is a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL. For the information of the gentleman from New York I will state that there is a resolution before the Committee on Rules, and has been for several days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not for several days.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; it was introduced before the holidays, and there has been a request from the minority members of the Committee on Rules for public inquiry and investigation into the charges made in that resolution. We did not believe that it was a private controversy between the chairman of the Committee on Rules and the gentleman from Boston, nor that the interview had between the gentleman from Boston and the chairman of the Committee on Rules precluded the committee——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think so. I do not think it precluded the committee from acting.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Every member of the minority of the Committee on Rules has been here ready for a public investigation on the charges made in that resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know what the gentleman means by "public investigation."

Mr. CAMPBELL. An investigation in which witnesses may be invited or subpœnaed, and to which the public should have access.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Kansas believe that the committee should make any preliminary inquiry?

Mr. CAMPBELL. He does; but that preliminary inquiry should be of a public character.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It should be made by the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Was not the request really that the Committee on Rules consider the matter, and they have continued that request, leaving the matter of public hearings to be determined afterwards?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I can not speak for the Committee on Rules or what it has done.

Mr. CAMPBELL. House resolution 420, I will state for the further information of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] on December 22.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the day on which we adjourned for the Christmas holidays?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the day on which we adjourned.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]—I could not catch quite all of the colloquy—I want to say that it is true that the resolution has been pending before the Committee on Rules and that resolution has not been taken up; it has not been disposed of. It is still pending, and the chairman of the Committee on Rules has not refused to call the committee together. In his individual capacity he was making some preliminary investigation, and any member of that committee can make the same investigation that the chairman was endeavoring to make.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HENRY. I am not through. Just one moment.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HENRY. There is no use in these gentlemen going off on a tangent about this matter. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] can go and have the same conference that I had with the gentleman with whom I talked yesterday, Mr. Lawson, of Boston.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But the gentleman from Kansas does not seek the notoriety of an interview with the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. HENRY. Just a moment. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] came and talked with me about this matter in my individual capacity and in his, and I say to this House that up to date neither the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] nor the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Lawson, has submitted anything that approaches information or a fact, not a name, not a date, or anything squinting at a case that they are trying to make out. I am still pursuing this investigation and trying to find out whether it is all claptrap or not.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Up to this time not a Member of this House on either side, if he knew the facts, would deign to trouble the members of the Committee on Rules to call them together for two minutes to consider the things that have been laid before the chairman of the Committee on Rules in his individual capacity.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HENRY. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if that is the case, if the information before the gentleman from Texas would dispose of all the matter, why not call the committee together and make it public, so that we will all be satisfied?

Mr. HENRY. I have not decided yet what I am going to do.

Mr. MANN. We are trying to get the gentleman to decide now.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that approaches any kind of a fact; it is all bosh and claptrap up to date, and I call on the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] to-day to give me one name, one date, one fact in regard to the things charged in his resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. And I challenge him here, and he can not give a single one.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements made regarding the action of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who is the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I think the House feels that it is only just that he should make this statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, there are several of us waiting for recognition. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] trying to transfer his recognition?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. To whom does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield?

Mr. HENRY. I do not yield for a moment. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of that committee I have not tried to suppress any investigation or any kind of a statement that any gentleman wants to come and lay before me as chairman. Mr. Lawson can go to every member of the Committee on Rules, and so can the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and state what they think are the facts in their cases, and if any member of the Committee on Rules——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Just one moment—if any member of the Committee on Rules, on the Democratic or the Republican side, will come and give me the name and the facts, I will call the committee together; but up to date there has been an absolute, dismal failure, and there has been nothing presented to me that would warrant me in calling the members together.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does not the gentleman from Texas have information that the Bostonian, Mr. Lawson, who called on him yesterday, said on his arrival in Washington that he would not give the information that he possessed to any member of the Committee on Rules, even to its chairman?

Mr. HENRY. Just to the contrary. In a three-hour conference with him I said, "Give me the names, the dates, and the facts, and I will call the committee together, or give me your word that you will furnish them to the full committee, and I will call them together"; but he said, "I can not do it."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that Mr. Lawson stated on his departure for home yesterday evening that he had given information to the chairman of the Committee on Rules upon which any man of intelligence would act?

Mr. BUTLER. Published in the Washington Post this morning.

Mr. HENRY. For three hours I asked him to give me the names and the dates, or to give them to some other member of the Committee on Rules, and he could not give a single name, and then I said, "If I call this committee together, will you then give the names and dates?" He said, "I can not; but I can tell, though, how they can find out." [Laughter.] Let him give some name. Here is how he said we could find it out. He said, "If you will allow me to represent the committee and pay its expenses and investigate the Stock Exchange of New York, and go into a general investigation of the stock exchange, you can find out these things by looking at their records."

Mr. MADDEN. That is what you want, is it not?

Mr. HENRY. Ah, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen know that Mr. Lawson has not given a single fact and that he can not give a single fact. I told him to go to the members of the committee; to go and confer with them as long as he pleased. I said the same thing to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and I say now, and I tell him, if he will send me the names and the facts, and if he can not bring them himself, to send them by any reputable Member of that side of the House—and they are all reputable—I will call the committee together to consider the matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is the Speaker prepared to rule or is he now hearing arguments on the question of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. It is a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been ready to rule for the last half hour. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall make a point of order against anything except discussing the point of order.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair wants to hear. The matter has drifted off from the point of order.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order, and ask for a ruling.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was discussing the point of order when interrupted by these extraneous matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was discussing the point of order. Now, if the gentleman from New York wants to say anything more about the point of order the Chair will hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did wish to say some things about the point of order, and of course I could not. I yielded in good faith to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], because matters had been discussed concerning which I thought he was entitled to make a statement.

If permitted, I desire to make clear my views as to the position of the House. I was arguing, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules the proper method was that there should be a preliminary inquiry by the Committee on Rules. In view of what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has said—and I say it in perfect good faith and sincerity—I desire to say that I believe his attitude is erroneous. The Committee on Rules ought to meet, and they ought to consider the resolution. This man, or any other man, who has been professing to have information that would show a corrupt or improper condition in this House, or such action on the part of its Members as is reprehensible, ought publicly to be compelled to give the information or to admit that he is a liar. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Now you are right.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman says the Committee on Rules ought to investigate. Has not the chairman told us already what his opinion is?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, I was stating what I believe should be done.

I am the chairman of a committee, but I am not the committee. [Applause.] I know that the chairman of a committee can not prevent, or will not desire to prevent, that being done which should be done. This preliminary inquiry should be made by the Committee on Rules so that it may report to the House whether the information obtained is sufficient to initiate the proceeding. I would make Mr. Lawson come before that committee and either demonstrate that he has information that justifies the statements he has been making in the public press, or I would characterize him as the most notorious liar the country has produced. [Applause.] That ought to be done.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I want to say that I fully agree with the gentleman. I said I had not made up my mind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman from Texas has been unfortunate in his statement that he would not call the Committee on Rules together to investigate these things until this man privately gave him certain assurances. [Applause.] I would not wait for any private assurances.

Mr. HENRY. I did not say that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. His statements have been made with a skill and a care that would have characterized the work of an expert in the rules of the House.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman did not understand me. He arrived at the wrong conclusion about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]—I may be mistaken—made the statement that if the gentleman from Boston, or any Member of the House, or any other person, would give him information showing the names, dates, or facts that would make a foundation for these statements, he would call his committee together. There is enough now to justify the Committee on Rules in acting. There is not enough to justify the House initiating an independent investigation, but it may be that even those, like myself, who wish the matter conducted in an orderly and proper manner may be forced to have the House take action if the Committee on Rules refuses to do it. [Applause.] I do not wish to precipitate that situation, but I believe it is the duty of this committee to bring this man before it and to ascertain for the House—that is what it exists for—to ascertain for the House whether he has foundation for what he states, or whether he is just trying to make capital out of us.

That is why I am not anxious to be rushed into this investigation. I have confidence in the chairman of the Committee on Rules and in the Committee on Rules itself. I believe if it were to meet and send for and obtain—and the House will give it all the power it needs—the men who are indulging in the statements which have been discussed, we would then quickly determine whether or not it is necessary to initiate a comprehensive and widespread investigation. Such an investigation will take time. It will take money. It will prove a matter of great inconvenience to many persons. We ought to have something in the way of a preliminary investigation in order to determine whether we wish to start that investigation. [Applause and cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. GARDNER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. GARDNER. He does.

The SPEAKER. Hereafter these extraneous matters will all be shut out.

Mr. GARDNER. The Speaker will rule as he sees fit about that. There has been a good deal of extraneous matter that has been tolerated by those of us who believe this should be investigated by a special committee rather than by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] rests his case upon a certain ruling of Mr. Speaker Reed. In that ruling Mr. Speaker Reed said:

Here is a newspaper paragraph of the very vaguest character.

Is this charge of Lawson's of the very vaguest character? He says there has been a leak. It is not a matter of my saying there has been a leak. I know there has been a leak, and I state it without any hesitation. The whole stock market shows that there was a leak.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Whether that leak was in the House of Representatives or not I do not know; but I am coming to another ruling, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] can get in on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question: Is not this statement of Lawson's more vague than the one that Speaker Reed was commenting on?

Mr. GARDNER. By no means. This Lawson statement says definitely that there will not be on hand on a certain occasion a quorum of Members of this House—a very plain statement, and the implication is very much clearer than in the statement upon which Mr. Speaker Reed was ruling.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have another parliamentary decision which has not yet had any attention called to it. I am not going to speak of it for just a moment, but as I see that the Clerk at the Speaker's desk wants the reference I will says it is in Hinds', Volume III, No. 2538. I am coming to it later.

Mr. Speaker, that single decision (Hinds, Vol. III, No. 2711) cited by the gentleman from New York referred to an obscure publication in an obscure paper. It was not a charge resounding through the whole country; but the whole country wide is talking about this Lawson matter, and the degree of publicity must be taken into account. We must consider that the good name of this House is involved. Also it is to be remembered that the House was very nearly divided on the question of overruling Speaker Reed in the case cited by the gentleman from New York. The vote was 95 to 71. Subsequently that decision of Mr. Speaker Reed's was practically overruled by Mr. Speaker CANNON. On July 4, 1906, Mr. THETUS W. SIMS, of Tennessee, claimed the floor for a question of privilege. I will read you the syllabus:

2705. A newspaper article charging Members of the House generally with abuse of the franking privilege was held to involve a question of privilege.

Mr. SIMS proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to investigate whether or not there are or have been abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress or in the name of Members of Congress.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that this was solely on a newspaper report that this whole question of the abuse of the franking privilege was based. The Speaker, Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, said:

The Chair hardly thinks that the article presents a question of personal privilege. * * * The Chair will state to the House that the resolution is privileged.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious that this presents a parallel case, except, Mr. Speaker, that there is an implication in Lawson's various statements that the leak did not come from here, but may have come from somewhere else. I know there was a leak somewhere, Mr. Speaker, and if I were on that committee of investigation I would summon the President of the United States, and I would ask him who were present when he discussed that matter, and I would ask each one of them whom they had told about that coming action of that note. I would find out which stenographer took the dictation, which typewriters transcribed it, and I would find out, Mr. Speaker, where that leak came from.

Now, the reason I bring in the question of the Executive is this: The decision to which I invite the Speaker's attention is No. 2538:

The statement by a Member that a certain thing "is rumored" is sufficient basis for raising a question of privilege.

An alleged corrupt combination between Members of the House and the Executive was investigated as a question of privilege.

There is in this case no corrupt combination between the Members of the House and the Executive, but there is a discussion involving the subordinates of the Executive. Now, let us see what Mr. Speaker Schuyler Colfax said in holding that resolution in order. His decision is found on page 1044, Volume II, of Hinds', about the middle of the page. Speaker Colfax said:

The Chair rules that this is unquestionably a question of privilege. The resolution states that it is rumored that certain Members of this House have been guilty of corrupt bargaining, acting in violation of their oaths, and that they have changed their views for corrupt motives. Although the resolution states that "it is rumored," still when a Member rises in his seat and states that it is so rumored—and introduces a resolution for an inquiry into the facts introduced, he of course makes himself the responsible author of the charge. The Chair, therefore, decides that it is a question of privilege.

And it must be a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. We can not have so tied ourselves up with our pettifogging rules that this House must strangle in its own parliamentary procedure. Neither ought we to evade adequate discussion upon a motion to refer. It is impossible to hold that this House has no way on earth as a matter of privilege to protect itself from such statements as that made by Lawson.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Do I understand the gentleman to state that it is rumored on the floor of the House that Members of the House are involved?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly not. What I say is this: Not only is it rumored, but it is so, that there was a leak, and the stock market showed it. Whether it was on the floor of this House or in the Executive, or where it was, I do not know. That is not a question of belief; that is not a question of rumor. I say it is so.

Mr. GARRETT. And does the gentleman mean to say, without being able to state, or even to intimate, that it came from the House, that it therefore involves a question of privilege, if it came from some other department?

Mr. GARDNER. It has been intimated, and almost said in so many words in the public press throughout the land, so that every man, woman, and child is discussing the House of Representatives to-day. I arrived here this morning, and I say that the gentleman has no conception of the way the people are aroused on this question. For us to evade an investigation is the greatest mistake that the Democratic or the Republican side of this House have made in the whole course of my service here.

Mr. BENNET. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee what the rumor is. The rumor is that Mr. Bernard Baruch, a member of the Council of National Defense, was the man who was responsible for this information getting to Wall Street, and that 30 minutes before the President's message was made public he sold on a rising market, in Steel, by the way, 15,000 shares of Steel common short. That is the rumor in New York City, if the gentleman wants names. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, that, of course, gives us information upon which we may be prepared to act; but that does not go to the question of the privileged character of this resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] begins, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that if he will bring in a resolution embodying the allegations, and do it upon his own responsibility, the Chair will hold his resolution privileged.

Mr. GARDNER. I will do it at once. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as it has been suggested by the Speaker that he would listen to the citation of the ruling of the present Speaker, I wish to call his attention to the latest ruling on this question, made by the present Speaker on July 2, 1913, on a resolution introduced by Representative SHERLEY in connection with the Mulhall charges. Curiously enough, that resolution was presented on Calendar Wednesday, and no point of order was raised that it was presented on Calendar Wednesday, but the only question raised was by the gentleman from Virginia, Judge Hay, that it was not privileged.

Now, what was that resolution? I hold that while specific names of Members were mentioned, it was virtually a charge casting reflections upon a great number of Members of the House. This resolution is of the same general character, because that resolution was bottomed upon an allegation made by a person who did not have anywhere near the standing of Thomas W. Lawson, but who was only a low lobbyist, Michael Martin Mulhall. Those charges were published in the New York World. The resolution was predicated upon that fact. It was as follows:

Whereas it appears that on the 29th day of June, 1913, there was published in the World, a newspaper of the city of New York, the following statement, viz:

"7. That among the men whom the lobbyists of this association"—

Meaning thereby the National Association of Manufacturers—

"had no difficulty in reaching and influencing for business, political, or sympathetic reasons during recent years were"—

Why, Mr. Speaker, the resolution here alleges the fact that there would not be a quorum of either House and that there would be a shifting of bank accounts should an investigation be had, and it goes on further to allege that the good old Capitol has been wallowing in Wall Street leak graft.

The Speaker must consider these charges together, in fairness to the dignity and honor of this House. No one can read these charges together without coming to the conclusion that Mr. Thomas W. Lawson intended to cast a reflection upon the entire membership of the House by charging that they got the leak and that they were wallowing in Wall Street leak graft. Why, that was not the charge of Michael Martin Mulhall. He only charged that they had no difficulty in reaching and influencing for business, political, or sympathetic reasons; but here is a particular charge that every one of us is implicated in wallowing in Wall Street graft. Now, what was the ruling of the Speaker? First, it was brought up by unanimous consent and was continued, as appears on page 2299 of the RECORD of July 2, 1913. While the unanimous-consent discussion was going on the Speaker said:

The Chair is inclined to think it is a question of the highest privilege.

But when pressed to a decision of the question, when objection was made by Mr. Hay, here is the ruling of the present Speaker, and it is the latest expression of the House on this point. It is true that the Chair can find precedents away back which did not give privilege to charges of this character, but if the Speaker will study the precedents he will find, as I recall them, that their drift has been to recognize such charges as presenting a question of privilege, and the Speaker ruled rightly in holding that that resolution, which cast reflection upon the membership of the House, was a question of privilege. Here is the Speaker's ruling, as found on page 2301 of the RECORD:

The Chair will state the whole matter. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] withdraws his request for unanimous consent and presents his resolution as a privileged resolution. It undoubtedly is a privileged resolution. That is what the Chair noted in the beginning, without any investigation about it. But since that the Chair has investigated it, and the precedents make it a question of privilege. It would be an astonishing thing, indeed, if charges that involve practically the whole House, more or less, should not be privileged, and the Chair entertains the resolution as a privileged resolution.

Why argue? This resolution is on all fours with that resolution and casts a reflection upon the whole membership of the House. I contend that if the Speaker adheres to that position he must hold this resolution in order.

The SPEAKER. Of course, each one of these matters that arise from time to time must stand on its own bottom. There are never any two of them exactly alike. In the case just cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] quite a number of Members of the House were specifically named in the matter complained of. In the ruling by Speaker CANNON as to the charge about the misuse of the franking privilege, it was just about as vague and as much of a blanket charge as this is. The gentleman from Massachussetts [Mr. GARDNER] assumes the responsibility. Speaker Reed reasoned very clearly, but each one of these cases stands by itself.

In this particular case Mr. Lawson charges by plainest implication that at least a majority of both the House and the Senate have been engaged in illegal and disgraceful speculation growing out of information they had no business to get in the first place, and if they did get it they had no moral right to act on it. The Chair thinks that this charge by Mr. Lawson is in derogation of the dignity of the House [applause], and therefore rules that this resolution is privileged.

Mr. HENRY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas——

Mr. MANN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Indiana is entitled to recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Texas what he rose for.

Mr. HENRY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY. I ask for recognition for the purpose of making a preferential motion to refer the resolution.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Indiana is entitled to recognition.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas is not recognized.

Mr. HENRY. Not by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. He is not recognized by the Speaker. The gentleman from Indiana introducing the resolution is entitled to recognition by the Chair. Whether somebody else is entitled to recognition to take him off his feet for the purpose of making a motion is not the question now before the Speaker. The gentleman from Indiana may himself desire to make a preferential motion. The introducer of the resolution is like a man in charge of a bill in the House and is entitled to first recognition from the Speaker, whether anybody else is entitled to recognition later for a preferential motion or not.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana will state that he wants to make a motion equal in dignity to that mentioned by the gentleman from Texas or higher, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do so state, Mr. Speaker. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report in 10 days.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a requiest in connection with the motion that has just passed the House. I am a member of the Committee on Rules—that is, sometimes. [Laughter.] I have been through many of these matters of investigation and have had occasion to deal with them as a member of the Committee on Rules, and have had occasion to deal with them as a member of special committees both under Republican and under Democratic administrations, and I wish to prefer a request for unanimous consent that in the consideration of this resolution the Committee on Rules shall have the power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths.

Mr. MANN. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that it would be necessary to confer that power by the House, and it ought to be by a written resolution so that there will be no question in reference to the matter if it should come to a dernier resort. I think there would be no objection to that, and also providing for the payment out of the contingent fund of the House. That was not in the resolution introduced because that would have deprived it of its privilege.

Mr. GARRETT. Very well, Mr. Speaker, at a later hour in the afternoon I shall have prepared a resolution which I will submit.

STANDARDS OF CLASSIFICATION FOR COTTON.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday and the Clerk will call the committees.

When the Committee on Agriculture was called,

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture I call up the bill (H. R. 15913) to provide uniform standards of classification for cotton.

The House automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNET. I object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15913) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish uniform standards of classification for cotton; to provide for the application, enforcement, and use of such standards in transactions in interstate and foreign commerce; to prevent deception therein; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of the "United States cotton standards act."

SEC. 2. That the word "person" wherever used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or singular, as the case demands, and shall include individuals, associations, partnerships, and corporations; the word "commerce" wherever used in this act shall be construed to mean commerce among the several States or in any Territory of the United States or in the District of Columbia, or between any such Territory and another Territory or a State, or between the District of Columbia and any State or Territory, or between any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia and any foreign country involving shipments or deliveries for shipment originating in the United States. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act the act, omission, or failure of any official, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any association, partnership, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office, shall in every case also be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such association, partnership, or corporation, as well as that of the person.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the ginning, wrapping, baling, sampling, weighing, handling, classifying according to grade and otherwise, compressing, tare, moisture content, certification, identification, warehousing, storage, transportation, marketing, and utilization of cotton and its products.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, from time to time, to establish and promulgate standards of cotton by which its quality or value may be judged or determined, including its grade, length of staple, strength of staple, color, and such other qualities, properties, and conditions as may be standardized in practical form, which, for the purposes of this act, shall be known as the "Official cotton standards of the United States," and to adopt, change, or replace the standard for any grade of cotton established under the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 251), and acts supplementary thereto: Provided, That any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall not be changed or replaced within a period less than one year from and after the date of the promulgation thereof by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided further, That no change or replacement of any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall become effective until after one year's public notice notice thereof, which notice shall specify the date when the same is to become effective. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to prepare practical forms of the official cotton standards which shall be established by him, and to furnish such practical forms from time to time, upon request, to any person, the cost thereof, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, to be paid by the person requesting the same, and to certify such practical forms under the seal of the Department of Agriculture and under the signature of the said Secretary, thereto affixed by himself or by some official or employee of the Department of Agriculture thereunto duly authorized by the said Secretary; and he is authorized to make rules and regulations governing the use and condemnation of said practical forms.

SEC. 5. That whenever any standard for cotton shall have been established and promulgated under this act, no person thereafter shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce, in contemplation or in pursuance of a sale, offer for sale, or consignment for sale, by grade or other class, any cotton to which such standard is applicable, unless the grade or other class by which it is sold, offered for sale, or consigned for sale be of one of the grades or other classes established therefor in the official cotton standards of the United States and such cotton conforms to the standard established for the specified grade or other class: Provided, That reasonable variations from the official standards may be permitted under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe. No person shall, in any contract or agreement of sale or agreement to sell or consign, either oral or written, involving, or in any invoice or bill of lading or other shipping document relating to, such shipment or delivery for shipment of any such cotton in commerce, describe or in any way refer to any of such cotton as being of any grade or other class other than one of those established therefor in the official cotton standards of the United States.

SEC. 6. That no person shall ship, or deliver for shipment, in commerce any cotton in contemplation or in pursuance of any sale, offer for sale, or consignment for sale, whether by grade or other class, or in any other manner, under any name, description, or designation which is false or misleading in any particular: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall prevent the shipment or delivery for shipment, otherwise lawful, of any cotton which is sold, offered for sale, or consigned for sale, on sample or type, without reference to grade or other class, under any name, description, or designation which is not false or misleading.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause examinations to be made of any cotton shipped or delivered for shipment in commerce in contemplation or in pursuance of any transaction in which such cotton shall have been represented, described, or certified to be of any grade or other class of the official cotton standards of the United States, or of any other description, name, or designation. Whenever, after opportunity for hearing is given to the owner or shipper of the cotton involved, it is determined by the Secretary of Agriculture that any such cotton has been incorrectly represented, described, or certified to be of any grade or other class of the official cotton standards of the United States, within the limitations of the authorized variations therefrom or to be of any description, name, or designation which is false or misleading in any particular, he may publish his findings.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to classify cotton according to grade or otherwise and to certificate the grade or other class thereof, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe. Any such license may be suspended or revoked by the Secretary of Agriculture whenever he is satisfied, after opportunity afforded to the licensee for a hearing, that such licensee has failed to classify cotton correctly, in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States, or has violated any provision of this act, or of the rules and regulations made hereunder, so far as the same may relate to him, or that he has used his license or allowed it to be used for any improper purpose whatsoever. Pending investigation, the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he deems necessary, may suspend a license temporarily without hearing. Whenever the owner or person in possession of any cotton which has been classified, and its classification certified, by a classifier licensed under this act, is dissatisfied with such classification, he may, within a reasonable time, to be fixed in the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue certificates, showing the true classification of the cotton involved in such appeals, signed by him, or in his name, by some officer or officers of the Department of Agriculture designated by him. For the purposes of sections 5 and 6 of this act, any cotton shall be deemed to conform to the grade or other class of the official cotton standards of the United States set forth in a certificate for such cotton, issued in compliance with this act and the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, obtained and used in good faith, without fraud or collusion, and a statement that it is of such grade or other class shall not be deemed to be false or misleading.

SEC. 9. That whenever a dispute arises as to the classification of any cotton which has been sold, offered for sale, consigned for sale, delivered for transportation, or transported, in commerce, any party interested in such transaction may refer the question of the true classification of said cotton to the Secretary of Agriculture for determination. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying out the purpose of this section, and his findings, upon any dispute referred to him under this section, made after the parties in interest have had an opportunity to be heard by him, or such officer, officers, agent, or agents of the Department of Agriculture as he may designate, shall be accepted in the courts of the United States in all suits between such parties, or their privies, as prima facie evidence of the true classification of the cotton involved.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Agriculture may charge and cause to be collected such fees as he may deem proper for licenses and renewals thereof to classifiers of cotton, and shall fix, assess, and cause to be collected and paid, in such manner and in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him, reasonable amounts for all determinations made, appeals heard, and certificates issued, by him under this act. All money paid to the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations made hereunder shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall, from time to time, make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That any person who, without written authority from the Secretary of Agriculture, shall receive, use, or have in his possession, any of the practical forms furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act which do not bear the certificate provided therefor by this act, or who alters, tampers with, or in any respect changes any of the said practical forms certified as provided for by this act, or who uses any of such practical forms after they shall have been condemned by the Secretary of Agriculture, or who shall, with intent to deceive or defraud, make, receive, use, or have in his possession any simulate or counterfeit practical form or forms of any standard of any cotton established under this act, or who fails to comply with or violates any of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture governing the use of said forms, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in section 13 of this act.

SEC. 13. That every person who shall violate any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made hereunder shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for the first offense, be fined not exceeding $200 or imprisoned not more than three months, or both, and for each succeeding offense shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both. After judgment by the court notice thereof shall be given by publication in such manner as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

SEC. 14. That every person who forcibly assaults, resists, impedes, or interferes with any officer or employee of the United States Department of Agriculture in the execution of any duties authorized to be performed by this act, or the rules and regulations made hereunder, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 15. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, available until expended, for the expense of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

SEC. 16. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall for any reason be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder of this act, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

SEC. 17. That this act shall be effective immediately, except sections 5, 6, 7, 9, and 13, which shall become and be effective on and after September 1, 1916.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish uniform standards of classification for cotton; to provide for the application, enforcement, and use of such standards in transactions in interstate and foreign commerce; to prevent deception therein; and for other purposes.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to a few of the facts connected with this bill, and to discuss very briefly the many purposes of the proposition.

It will be remembered that under the provisions of the cotton-futures act the Department of Agriculture was authorized to establish standards of grades of cotton. Those standards have now been established, and they are now being used compulsorily under the terms of the cotton-futures act in the settlement of disputes arising under that act.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, would it interrupt the gentleman if I were to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. Voluntarily a great many of the spot-cotton exchanges, exchanges which do not deal in future trading whatever, have adopted the Government standards of cotton grades. There are, however, some spot exchanges which as yet have not adopted the grades. The purpose of this legislation is to compel, as far as possible, within reasonable limitations, the transaction of the business of buying and selling cotton upon the standards already fixed or proposed to be fixed in this bill. I now yield to the gentleman from New York for a question.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the bill to which the gentleman referred a moment ago as the bill in relation to futures was an act which was at one time declared unconstitutional by Judge Hough, and which was subsequently passed in this House as a rider upon the Agricultural appropriation bill, as I recall it.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. BENNET. And it is now the law of the land.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the bill at present under consideration does not in any respect remotely or directly relate to the trade in cotton futures, but affects only spot-cotton transactions entering into interstate and foreign commerce. This bill, Mr. Chairman, is a companion measure to what is known as the grain-standards act which was passed at the last session of Congress as a rider upon the appropriation bill, and which passed this House by an almost unanimous vote and is now the law. If anything, the provisions of this bill are somewhat less drastic in their regulatory features than are the provisions of the grain-standards act, but the main purpose sought to be accomplished in the grain-standards act for the grain trade of the country is sought to be accomplished in this measure for the cotton industry of the country.

The matter of the standardization of transactions in farm products is becoming more and more recognized by economic students as a matter of very great importance in bringing to agricultural products their true value. The evidence of that is the recent action of Congress in passing the standard-barrel act and in fixing a standard basket for grapes. The whole tendency of economic thought at this time is in the direction of the standardization of agricultural products and of transactions in those products with a view to bring to the parties interested in such products the largest possible light with the ultimate end of securing the very best results to all concerned. The fundamental purpose of this bill is in that direction. I would call the committee's attention also to this fact, which is very important in connection with the consideration of the bill. About 66 per cent of the cotton of the United States under normal conditions goes into export and is consumed by the manufacturing establishments of foreign countries. The standards upon which some of these foreign countries deal are supposed to be more or less disadvantageous to the producers of cotton, and there has been a feeling growing increasingly in this country that every opportunity should be made to get the world upon a universal standard basis for cotton. Many conferences engaged in by representatives of the cotton trade of this country, producers and manufacturers alike, and by manufacturers abroad have been held with the view of arriving at some universal standard upon which this great product can be handled. Section 11 of the cotton-futures act as reported to the House was intended to bring about such a universal standard. That section went out in conference with the Senate and is not a part of the law. We are attempting in this bill, as much as in anything else, to compel foreign establishments which buy our cotton to buy it upon a standard which we ourselves fix. I do not believe that there is a student of cotton, either producer or consumer, who will not admit that a universal standard for cotton would be beneficial to that great product, beneficial all along the line, from the standpoint of the producer as well as that of the consumer and the manufacturer of cotton. It has always seemed to me paradoxical, if not ludicrous, that this great Government of ours should permit the cotton grower of this country to be the victim of standards, upon which he sells his crop, fixed by foreigners who buy 66 per cent of the crop; and we are endeavoring in this bill to give to those interested in cotton in this country the right to say what the yardstick of measurement shall be for that which they sell in this country as well as in foreign countries.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, first, that I would be very glad indeed to have all of the countries of the world that manufacture, consume, or deal in cotton agree upon an arbitrary nomenclature of the corresponding qualities, but, of course, there are troubles that we would encounter when you undertake to do that. You can not class Egyptian cotton with ours, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. LEVER. Certainly; and in this bill we do not undertake to do so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that there has never been any practical difficulty in the cotton trade in arriving at a proper understanding of the classes of cotton when the Liverpool classification is known?

Mr. LEVER. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Texas that while the difference in the Liverpool standards as compared with those which we have already fixed in this country apparently are not very great, yet when this country endeavored to induce the Liverpool exchanges to adopt our standards of grades two years ago, for some reason or other unknown to me they absolutely refused to do it. I have, however, hoped that voluntarily universal standards would come in the course of time, and a new future exchange being organized at Rotterdam at this time, although not actively engaged in operations on account of the war conditions, if my recollection is correct, will adopt the Government standards of grades, and very nearly adopt the contract provided for in the futures act.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not my friend from South Carolina believe that that attitude of the Liverpool cotton trade, the English cotton trade, Manchester included, is largely due to that peculiar racial quality of the British which has caused them to refuse to make changes of any sort?

Mr. LEVER. I do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They adhere to pounds, shillings, and pence, which we think absurdly illogical, and their weights are perhaps more illogical than ours, too.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman has put his finger upon the difficulty. It is a commercial instinct, as it were, a commercial characteristic, if you want to call it that, that makes the Briton reluctant to give up that which he has done for generations.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is right; and it is a good quality, too, in politics.

Mr. LEVER. But if we can accelerate our British cousins into adopting our standard of doing business, we will do it, and that is what we are undertaking to do as one of the objects of this bill.

Now, another purpose of this legislation——

Mr. BENNET. Before the gentleman takes up another point——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LEVER. For a question.

Mr. BENNET. What does section 4 of this bill do?

Mr. LEVER. I wonder if the gentleman would not prefer that I would discuss that under the five-minute rule? I was going to make a brief general statement now.

Mr. BENNET. I want to say to the gentleman in all frankness that I propose, if no member of the committee exercises his right of taking the hour, to ask for that right, and it might shorten the time if the gentleman would answer my question.

Mr. LEVER. I would ask the gentleman what section he refers to?

Mr. BENNET. Section 4.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman desires to know what that proposes to do?

Mr. BENNET. What does it propose to do that the act which it refers to does not propose to do? I can not see that it confers any power on the Secretary of Agriculture that he has not already.

Mr. LEVER. The act in section 4, I think, is identical with the language of the cotton-futures act. But we could not tell what action the courts might take upon the cotton-futures act, and we desired to have permanent legislation that was certain in its constitutionality, giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority to fix these standard grades of cotton, and, therefore, we have repeated that in this bill.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman did not comprehend my question.

Mr. LEVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BENNET. The act as cited on page 3 of House bill 15913 is the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, and that seems to give the Secretary of Agriculture in detail the power to establish nine grades of cotton, and so forth, and my question was, What does this act do that the act of the Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, page 251, does not do?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will understand, of course, that that authority was given upon an appropriation bill in 1909. We afterwards, in the cotton-futures act, undertook to make permanent that legislation referred to in this section. Now, in order to be doubly sure we are including it in this bill in the identical language, I think, of the cotton-futures act, not the act which the gentleman has before him. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. BENNET. That answers it perfectly. The gentleman's idea is that possibly this appropriation bill is permanent law and possibly it is not?

Mr. LEVER. Possibly it is not.

Mr. BENNET. And therefore, for better security, he is giving substantially the same power to the Secretary of Agriculture which that act gave?

Mr. LEVER. And possibly the cotton-futures act is unconstitutional and possibly it is not. Certainly this bill is constitutional, and we are taking no chances on it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina why this grant of power to the Secretary of Agriculture in section 3, to go into South Carolina and small communities and investigate the ginning, wrapping, baling, sampling, weighing, handling, classifying, and so forth, and transportation and marketing?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that that language has been carried in the agricultural appropriation bill for many years, probably 10 or more, and this is transferring it here and giving the Secretary permanent authority to do it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of what value is it if it has been in the act for 10 years?

Mr. LEVER. We think the matter of ginning, wrapping, baling, sampling, weighing, handling, classifying according to grade and otherwise, compressing, tare, moisture content, certification, identification, warehousing, storage, transportation, marketing, and utilization of cotton and its products constitutes a matter which is worthy of the very careful consideration of the Department of Agriculture, worthy of investigation with a view to determine probably better methods of ginning, probably less wasteful methods of wrapping, less wasteful methods of sampling; and the gentleman knows there is a large waste in sampling and things of that kind.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, yes; but the gentleman knows very well that the employees of the Government do not know as much as people engaged in the trade about those things. They are young men who have been hired to take these places with the Government because they have not been able to do better outside.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman in that connection that is a statement often made upon the floor of the House and is more or less true. I recognize the truth of it, and yet we have had a very serious difficulty in the Bureau of Markets this year in the fact that great cotton firms have taken the young men we have just been training for two years—one, I recall, at a salary of $12,000—by one of the biggest cotton firms of the United States.

Mr. SLAYDEN. To do what?

Mr. LEVER. To help handle the big business of that cotton firm that is a century old.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; but he must have handled the part of it that meant trade, not the classing of cotton.

Mr. LEVER. He got his training as a cotton dealer.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Many of the most successful cotton dealers in the world have obtained their training in the same way. At one time I had in my office when I was in the cotton business a negro who was the best cotton classer I ever saw. He could have gone on the Liverpool or New York Cotton Exchange. He could have classed thousands of bales of cotton better than the most highly trained man which they had. But that is not a high order of talent.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that, of course, the Department of Agriculture in its activities ramifies into almost every line of agriculture, of whatever character.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is exactly what I was asking about.

Mr. LEVER. And we are doing no more in this bill for cotton than is now being done for grain and hemp and things of that kind.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is just exactly what I was asking about, because I do not quite sympathize with the idea of an agent or an inspector of the Government coming around and poking his nose into everybody's business.

Mr. LEVER. It is for the purpose of developing economic truth and not for the purpose of interfering with the trade at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In the course of my business I have seen a good many of them, and I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that I do not think any of them ever made any valuable suggestions.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. In section 3, to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has been calling attention, you authorize the Secretary of Agriculture "to investigate the ginning, wrapping, baling, sampling, weighing, handling, classifying according to grade and otherwise, compressing, tare, moisture content, certification, identification, warehousing, storage, transportation, marketing, and utilization of cotton and its products."

Now, a section later on provides heavy penalties and fines against anyone who interferes with or obstructs any agent of the department in performing any of the duties that may be conferred in this act. Does the gentleman understand that if any agent of the department should go to a man, a ginner in my State, for instance, and want to see how he was ginning or wrapping his cotton, he would have the right to do it whether the ginner wanted him to enter the gin or not?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think an employee of the Department of Agriculture would have authority to interfere with any of the constitutional rights of a citizen of this country.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, why undertake to confer upon him that right and prescribe a penalty for a citizen resisting that right when the gentleman knows that he has no right?

Mr. LEVER. We do not think we do.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the gentleman think that section 3 does that?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think that any Secretary would undertake to punish an individual because he did not let him or one of his agents go into his ginhouse and look into the way things were going. I think this is a matter that will be worked out between the employee of the department and the proprietor of the concern.

Mr. CARAWAY. Section 13 provides—

That every person who shall violate any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made hereunder shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so on. Section 14 provides—

That every person who forcibly assaults, resists, impedes, or interferes with any officer or employee of the United States Department of Agriculture in the execution of any duties authorized to be performed by this act, or the rules and regulations made hereunder, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

Under the plain provisions of the bill is it not true that if a man who was operating a gin in Texas and some agent of the department came down there and wanted to stop him in the method of wrapping his cotton or ginning it, or any other act in connection with the operation of his gin, would he not be subject under the provisions of the bill to the penalties prescribed in section 14?

Mr. SLAYDEN. And would he not be taken to the United States court for punishment?

Mr. LEVER. I think it would depend upon the individual case. I do not think that any Secretary of Agriculture would be so foolish as to undertake any such proceeding.

Mr. CARAWAY. The citizens should not have to enjoy their liberty merely at the sufferance of the Secretary of Agriculture. Do you not think it unwise to write into a bill an authorization empowering the Secretary of Agriculture to interfere with a citizen in the exercise of his own plain, inherent, and constitutional rights?

Mr. LEVER. What we are trying to do here is to protect the employees of the Department of Agriculture who are doing the real work proposed in this bill, as will be found in sections 5 and 6 and probably in section 7 of the act.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If one is assaulted in the prosecution of his duty?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman thinks this is too broad an authority to be conferred, and has an amendment that he can work out, I will be glad to cooperate with him.

Mr. CARAWAY. It just strikes me that section 3 is no part of the bill. It has nothing to do with what the act itself intends to accomplish. But it is an unwarranted interference on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture with the private conduct of a business in a State, and therefore it seems to me that there are unlimited possibilities of disputes arising.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that section 3 is intended to furnish the Secretary of Agriculture with the authority to get the scientific fundamental principles by an investigation and study upon which we can fix the grades and classification and things of that kind, and also to give to the people the benefit of a thorough study, for instance, of warehousing.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LEVER. I will be glad to.

Mr. COLLIER. This only gives the Secretary of Agriculture authority to investigate it. It does not give him authority to have any sort or kind or character of control over it?

Mr. LEVER. None whatever.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Section 14 says that if any citizen shall resist any agent of the department in trying to perform any of the duties prescribed in this act he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. One of the duties is to go into the gin and see how you gin it.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman's point is this, that the penal section of this bill might make it possible to prosecute a man who did not desire that an agent of the department on an errand of investigation for truth should come into his ginhouse. It might make it possible to prosecute that man and make him liable to the penal provisions of this act. It is not the intention of the committee that that should be done. If the gentleman will prepare an amendment to cure that danger I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to consider it when we reach the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COLLIER. I think there should be some such amendment as that.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, just one other thought in connection with this bill, and then I shall have concluded my general statement:

One of the most important things in the handling of cotton is the matter of correctly grading it. I have always thought there were about three classes of cotton graders. One may be described as the grader who is thoroughly competent, who knows how to grade, and who does grade honestly. The second class, constituting I am happy to think a very, very small per cent, is the competent grader who for some reason or other does not honestly grade. The third class, and the one most affecting the farmer because they constitute a very large per cent, are those who do not themselves know what cotton grades are, or the differences in cotton grades, except as shown by price and color. Now, the farmer is the man who suffers first of all by the dishonest cotton grader. He is the man who suffers likewise from the incompetent cotton grader, and we are proposing in this bill, as nearly as we can under our peculiar form of government, to furnish to the cotton producer of this country a competent grader, an honest grader, and an impartial grader, so that the farmer may have the benefit of competency, honesty, and impartiality in parting with his product. We undertake to accomplish that through certain sections of this bill, notably sections 8 and 9.

We provide that the Secretary of Agriculture may issue licenses to graders to classify cotton, and that any individual who feels that his cotton has not been properly classified shall have the right on his own initiative to appeal from the decision of the licensed grader to a board who, I take it, under the practical working out of this bill, will be composed of experts, or more expert graders appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the findings of that board of expert classifiers as to the true grade or class of that cotton would be prima facie evidence in the Federal courts of the true grade or class of that cotton. We are endeavoring, as nearly as we can, to furnish to the producer of cotton an umpire who will give him the benefit of knowing the value and the grade of that which he produces. Some few weeks ago I saw a statement issued by the Department of Agriculture to the effect that the farmers of this country, through a lack of knowledge of the grades of their cotton, were losing $7,500,000 a year. That is an exceedingly conservative estimate of their loss. My own judgment, based upon some knowledge of cotton, some knowledge of the men who produce cotton, and some knowledge of the methods by which cotton is sold—my own judgment is that the farmers of this country are suffering an annual loss through a failure to grade their cotton properly amounting to from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, and that, in my opinion, is a conservative estimate of their loss. We are trying in this bill to standardize the method of handling this great product. We are endeavoring, if we can, to force the world, the users of cotton in both foreign and domestic markets, to handle that product upon a standard fixed for them by an impartial governmental tribunal. That is the purpose of this legislation.

I shall be glad, as the bill is read under the five-minute rule, to undertake to answer questions as to the details of the bill, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this, I think, is a well-meant attempt to establish American standards for one of our most important commodities. There is no cotton grown in the State which I represent in part. Sometimes we from New York State have been criticized because when matters affecting our State were before the House we were absent. I want to call attention to the contrast. This is a question which affects the cotton States, and I want to call the attention of the House to the full attendance on that side of the House while this matter affecting the cotton States is being discussed.

It seems to me that the gentleman from South Carolina is going to fail in his attempt to establish an American system of standards by this bill, and that is because of some of the provisions in the bill itself.

What is a standard? It is something that is definite and certain. Now, when I was down in Jacksonville some years ago they showed me standards of resin, not established by the Government, but established by trade and custom, and they told me that those standards were known all over the world, and that by the use of those little cubes a man in Paris, or in Petrograd, or anywhere else, could buy resin, and that he was entitled to have delivered to him resin of the standard determined by a particular cube, and that by the mere mention of a number as applied to resin every man who dealt in resin anywhere in the world would know what that resin was. That is what you have got to do in any world trade. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and his committee are purposing to make a world standard in connection with cotton, they have utterly and signally failed. There are two provisions in this bill that destroy all possibility of erecting standards in competition with the British standards. And before I go into that question I want to say parenthetically that that is what has given Great Britain her preeminence in these matters, that when Great Britain establishes a standard it is established, and it is known and it is adhered to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The trade establishes the standard, and the British Government adopts that standard which has been established by the trade.

Mr. BENNET. Exactly, and the British Government has the good common sense to establish as its standards the grades and standards which trade and custom have established. I do not deny that sometimes possibly they stick to them too long, and that sometimes they carry forms over that mean nothing any more. Take their great business of shipping in which they lead the world. Take the insurance contracts in connection with ships and cargoes. There are words and phrases in those contracts that have been obsolete for 300 years. I will admit that; but no necessary, essential thing in the British grades or standards has been changed. We propose to establish a world standard for our products, and I sympathize with that effort.

Mr. LEVER. I am interested in the gentleman's statement that we do not have the power to do it.

Mr. BENNET. I did not say that. I say we do have the power.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to me we have it in this bill, and that of necessity they have to use our standards or else they can not get our cotton goods.

Mr. BENNET. That is what I propose to show to the gentleman, that his bill defeats itself. Here the gentleman in two different paragraphs of his bill destroys the certainty that is necessary for the standard grades. The constituency which I represent in part has an interest in that. This bill, as the gentleman informs the House, deals only with spot cotton and not with futures. I have no doubt that the cotton exchange in my State deals in spot cotton. I do not know whether it has voluntarily come under the standards that the Department of Agriculture fixed or not.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNET. Then it has a greater interest in this bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know or understand that if the southern cotton raisers could have a real, legitimate, honest grade there would be very little conflict between the honest grade here and the standard British grade? That is what we want, to keep the standard grade and to keep the interlopers and trimmers between us and the mill from killing the cotton planter.

Mr. BENNET. That is my contention, to see that the grade is not an artificial thing, but one fixed by trade and custom. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas, because I presume he knows about cotton and I do not. In the act of 1909 this House authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to establish nine grades of cotton. I suppose those names of the grade mean something to the gentleman from Texas, although they mean very little to me. Has the Department of Agriculture since that time used its power to establish the grades known to the trade and established by the trade, or have they established arbitrary grades?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I will say that I think the purpose of this very measure is to cure that defect and put into action, beginning at the bottom, the honest grades and carry it clear through.

Mr. BENNET. Then that is a third defect in the bill, because nowhere in the bill, so far as I can read it, is any greater power conferred on the Secretary of Agriculture than was conferred by the act of 1909.

Mr. LEVER. The only power there conferred was the power to establish standard of grades, but the gentleman would not contend that there is no additional power conferred in this bill.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no; I mean in respect to that; but the basic defect in this bill lies in the fact that with the commendable purpose in view, with which I sympathize, to establish in America for an American product an American standard, the gentleman's bill, it seems to me, defeats its own purpose.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's complaint is that in section 4, the first and second provisos, the Secretary is given authority to change these standards under certain conditions.

Mr. BENNET. That is my first point.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that if it will help him get right on this proposition that this language, as I said before, is identical with the language in the cotton-futures act. The cotton-futures act was framed after long and interesting hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, before which the gentleman's constituents came, and I do not think that any witness who came before that committee, either in favor of or against the bill, made any objection to the proviso to which the gentleman has called attention; but, on the contrary, my recollection is that it was pretty universally agreed that a standard ought not to be changed without a reasonable notice being given, but that no one was willing to arbitrarily fix a standard saying that the horse was 40 feet high and then stick to it when it afterwards developed that the standard had not been fixed in the most scientific manner.

I will say to the gentleman there is very small probability of this power being exercised, except as the experts of the Department of Agriculture increase in their knowledge of the factors that go to make up grade values. For instance, the general impression is that the word "grade" in cotton means a great deal more than it does. A grade in cotton means only leaf and trash. It is not controlled by color, even.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the gentleman is using language that may not be understood by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEVER. I will allow the gentleman to help enlighten the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there is a grade in cotton, and always has been, of middling, which is what the name itself suggests. If you buy a thousand bales for future delivery in the New York market, it is based on middling, and if any cotton of another grade is delivered, the man receiving it will pay an additional value for such grades as are above middling and be credited with such cotton as is below middling. Now, any man who has 60 days' experience in the cotton trade knows what middling is. I believe there are 40,000 men in Texas who can tell middling cotton, strict middling, low middling, and so forth. It is determined by the appearance of the cotton. Now, middling cotton may be worth 10 cents or 20 cents a pound, depending on the length and strength of the staple.

Mr. BENNET. I made a statement a short time ago about the grades of rosin, which I believe to be correct. Was it correct?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know anything about rosin.

Mr. LEVER. I did not hear the gentleman's whole statement, as I was engaged at the moment.

Mr. BENNET. I made a statement awhile ago as to the way that standards in rosin are made. Was that substantially correct?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; the Department of Agriculture, under a provision in an appropriation bill, has standardized types of rosin and the trade has about universally accepted those standards.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not the Department of Agriculture, it is what the trade had already done in the way of grading, and properly accepted by the department.

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure about that. I know that they have come to some sort of an agreement which is satisfactory to the department. The same thing has taken place in reference to the grade of cotton. The Department of Agriculture did not go out and collect a lot of schoolboys and ask them to come in and standardize the grades of cotton. On the contrary, the Department of Agriculture with respect to the standards of cotton, as well as of grain, has gone to the trade, and in both products the widest latitude in the way of suggestion has been allowed and sought, and in many instances the better practices of the trade have been written into these standards.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did not the Department of Agriculture accept the grades of the trade, practically?

Mr. LEVER. The trade was consulted.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know intimately, and had known him for many years, a gentleman in the cotton trade, who was one of the people brought up here from Texas to fix these types.

Mr. BENNET. That is the word—"types."

Mr. SLAYDEN. I asked him what he was doing, and he said he was going to prepare some cotton types as a guide or standard for other types. I asked him how they differed from that of the trade, and he said in no respect, that each type represented the well known and thoroughly established classes, grades, or types—these words are virtually the same in speaking of cotton—of the trade.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, these grades have been fixed by the best expert opinion in and out of the trade that can be had in the country and are satisfactory to the trade and are now almost in universal use in this country.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I see by the bill that certain fees are to be collected, which are to be certified into the Treasury, indicating that the bill will be self-sustaining. If that be true, why is it necessary that this appropriation of $50,000 shall be carried in the bill in order to carry the act into effect?

Mr. BENNET. On what page of the bill is that?

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is provided that fees shall be certified into the Treasury.

Mr. BENNET. I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] if he will answer that question? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] says that the bill provides that fees shall be collected and that that seems to indicate that the law is to be self-sustaining. If that is so, what is the necessity for the appropriation carried in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, we do not expect that the fees collected in this bill will be sufficient to administer the act. The fee will be really a nominal fee, rather than an actual fee.

Mr. SHERWOOD. There is no specification here as to what these fees shall be or what the salaries of the inspectors are to be. Should they not be fixed in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. We think not. I will say to the gentleman that we feel that the custom of the trade will fix the fee for grading, as, for instance, in the matter of the weighing of cotton in the South. The custom in any State will control as to the amount that will be charged for the weighing, 5 or 10 cents a bale, and the fees for grading will be fixed in the same way.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will it be the purpose of the bill and the intention that the $50,000 appropriated shall be reimbursed to the Treasury afterwards in the collection of fees?

Mr. LEVER. No; the fees would go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and we would have to appropriate from year to year, as we always do, a sufficient amount to administer the act, but the fees themselves under the terms of the act would go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like now to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] a question. He has been very kind in his explanation. I thought I understood him to say during his remarks that for some reason the Liverpool exchanges had not accepted our grades and standards of cotton?

Mr. LEVER. If I did not say all of this, I will say it now. This country made a very strong effort immediately after the passage of the cotton-futures act to have all foreign exchanges adopt both the contracts fixed by the cotton-futures act and the standard of grades as fixed by the Department of Agriculture under the act to which the gentleman has been referring. We sent our special representative over there from the Department of Agriculture. It looked for many weeks as though we were going to succeed in inducing the Liverpool exchange to accept our contract and our standard of grades. All of a sudden, for some reason unknown to me, probably for the reason suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], namely, the racial characteristics of the Briton, they did not accept either our standard of grades nor our contract. We then thought for a while that the Bremen exchange would undoubtedly accept both propositions and therefore open itself up to free trading between the membership of its exchange and the membership of ours. About that time the war broke out in Europe and a little later the act was declared unconstitutional, so that we have been in that condition since that time.

But in the meantime, within the past six months, a new exchange has been organized at Rotterdam, and I understand that that exchange intends, when it opens for business, to bring itself within the provisions of the cotton-futures act, which means that it would have to accept in a reasonable way the provisions of the cotton-futures act and our standard. This bill, however, is intended, as it concerns the adoption of the standard, to accelerate foreign nations in accepting our standards.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Without reference to future dealings?

Mr. LEVER. Without any reference to future dealings whatever.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would like to ask a question. This inspection applies to cotton whether sold abroad or sold on the spot, does it not?

Mr. LEVER. This bill applies to cotton that is going into interstate or foreign commerce, but it does not apply to cotton coming into this country. It applies to cotton going out of the country.

Mr. SHERWOOD. But does not apply to cotton sold on the spot to a citizen of the State?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no. It applies only to interstate transactions.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BENNET. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Some of us were confused by the observation of the gentleman from Texas made to the gentleman from New York, where he referred to a middling, and stated as a grade it would be middling, and it might be worth 10 cents or 20 cents owing to the length of fiber. That is confusing to me. What is the grade?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The grade is based on the appearance of the cotton. The middling type will show a certain grade. You may have cotton which is grown down in the Mississippi Valley around Natchez, like the Peeler or the Allen cotton, or any other variety cultivated with the view of a longer fiber, that would have a staple 1⅛ inches long. It would look precisely like the upland cotton which has a short staple, but it would be worth more money.

Mr. FESS. Are they of the same class?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of the same class.

Mr. FESS. Is it sold as the same grade?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; but it is also sold with reference to the length of fiber. Appearance only fixes the grade.

Mr. FESS. That is rather confusing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; it is not. For example, when I was in the cotton trade I sold a good deal of cotton to my New England friends, and when I guaranteed the length of the cotton as 1⅛ inches, I got more for it than I could for ⅞-inch cotton. I got an advanced price for it, although of the same class or grade as that for which I received less.

Mr. FESS. And grade is simply appearance?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Practically it is appearance.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the cotton like the Egyptian cotton sold, if my recollection is right, last fall for 35 cents a pound, when the short-staple variety was selling for 13½ cents a pound.

Mr. FESS. You say the same grade of cotton, and that is what confuses me.

Mr. HEFLIN. I mean the cleanliness of the cotton.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. BENNET. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that grade in cotton means the amount of trash, the amount of leaf, and to an extent the character of the color in the cotton, but the value of cotton is not only fixed by the amount of trash and leaf and the kind of color it has, but it is likewise fixed by the length of its staple, by the tensile strength of that staple, whether or not that cotton is what we call gin-cut; that is, by the gin running too fast it has cut the staple, and therefore lowered its value. It depends somewhat on the amount of sand in it. It depends to an extent on whether or not the cotton has been water packed; that is, whether or not in packing the cotton water has been added to give it weight; and various other things that up to this time have not been standardized by the department, and some of them, I am afraid, can not be standardized so that they can be visualized to the individual. What we have standardized so far, I will say to the gentleman, are color and trash. Does that make it plain?

Mr. FESS. I think it does. Where I am confused is, where a law is to protect the public it seems to me the value of it would be determined in the price of it, and the grade would certainly be high or minimum, and so on. But if it is simply a matter of appearance and not quality, I am not so much interested in the bill as I was.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will understand that authority is given here in section 4 to the Secretary to establish and promulgate standards of cotton by which its value and quality may be judged, including its grade, strength of staple, color, and such other qualities, properties, and conditions as may be standardized in practical form. We are giving the authority here. But up to this time we have not been able to set out in any practical form, so that the eye can see it, the length of staple in the bale of cotton, which is an important factor in fixing value, but we hope they will develop some instrument by which they can easily determine it in the hands of men in the market.

Mr. FESS. I thought that element was in the bill and was the main feature.

Mr. LEVER. That element is in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. In order that our friends from other States that do not raise cotton may understand the merit or gravamen of this measure, we will say that middling cotton is the best for all our trade. If that middling cotton is cleaned and oiled and has not been exposed to water, and the oil is still there, and the fiber is smooth, it is good middling or strict middling. If it is full of trash or sand or has been defectively ginned, it is a grade lower, a low middling. That is the difference. Now, the whole object, in view of this measure, and I have tried to carefully consider it, is to begin down here and protect the real grading of the cotton from, as I said before, interlopers, whether intentionally or otherwise, who misgrade the cotton, because where it goes to the mills it has to be up to standard. Hence the farmer must sustain most of the loss, and it is for the purpose more of making an honest grade and carrying that through from beginning to end than it is otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

Mr. BENNET. In my time?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Very well.

Mr. MADDEN. Will it ever be possible for the Department of Agriculture to ascertain just exactly what a grade of cotton is, inside the bale? That is the point.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. There are augers by which you can go plumb into the bale after it is ginned, and most of the States have laws regulating the method by which it shall be ginned. At the close of the ginning season I may have 500 pounds of cotton and my neighbor may have 100 pounds, and another neighbor a certain amount, and it takes it all to make a bale. Cotton of that kind is called "club bales" in some States, and in some States it is known as "dog-tail bales." That cotton is classified on the basis of the lowest grade of cotton in the bale. The ginner has to get the consent of all these different people to put their remnants into one bale, because otherwise the cotton could not be baled.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Suppose a purchaser buys a thousand bales of middling cotton. What does he get?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. If the cotton upon actual delivery and classification is middling, he gets middling cotton of the standard, regular commercial grade of the world. If it is below middling it has to be made good by a deficit. If it is above middling he has either won on it or he has to make good to the man he sold to.

Mr. FESS. Does he never know what he gets until it is delivered?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. That is the idea of having a standard. We want everybody to be able to know what it is from the time it leaves the gin clear through. That is it exactly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. BENNET. I yield first to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of Markets, one of the new bureaus, the Division of Markets, I believe, to be called "Bureau of Markets" hereafter, has recently made a very interesting investigation in regard to the primary sale of cotton, and among other delightful literature which I read during the holidays was their report on that subject, which I commend to everybody in the House to read, and particularly to those gentlemen representing cotton States. They gathered together specimens of cotton by the thousands, with the actual price and date of sale in various States of the Union—Arkansas, Texas, and Alabama, and Mississippi, I think; I know in one or both of the Carolinas—taking a sample of the cotton, getting the price paid by the original purchaser from the original producer; and they discovered that in a very large proportion of the cases higher prices were paid for lower-valued cotton, even where it was subject to grade, according to the description which the gentleman gives. The purchaser of the cotton, the dealer—and I assume not with any intention of defrauding the seller at all—would pay to-day a high price for cotton from one seller and a lower price for cotton from another seller, when investigation showed that the low-priced seller had cotton worth a great deal more than the higher-priced seller.

I do not know, from statements made by the gentlemen who have spoken, whether the length of staple enters at all into the grades. I know myself enough about cotton from reading to know that a long staple makes a difference in the value, and that cotton with a staple three-quarters of an inch in length is not worth so much per pound as cotton with staple an inch in length or cotton with staple more than an inch in length. I do not know; I had supposed before that the long staple had something to do with the grade, but the gentlemen say not. It appeared, however, that in many cases cotton with a staple three-quarters of an inch in length was bought at a higher price in the same locality at the same time than cotton with staple of more than an inch in length, although the cotton with staple an inch in length was worth a number of dollars more per bale than cotton with a staple three-quarters of an inch in length. Will this bill correct that?

Mr. LEVER. We hope that this bill will correct that.

Mr. MANN. How?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MANN. Very briefly.

Mr. LEVER. I will yield more time to the gentleman if he needs it.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is correct when he says that the length of the staple is not an element in what we now know as grade.

Mr. MANN. I did not say that. I said that you said that.

Mr. LEVER. Well, that is true.

Mr. MANN. It is hard for me to believe it, by the way.

Mr. LEVER. But we conferred authority in this bill upon the Secretary of Agriculture to continue investigations that he is now making with a view to developing some way by which we can standardize cotton as to the length of staple, moisture content, and other factors not now standardized that go to make value in cotton. What we are trying to do here is to provide authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to make those studies, and, when possible, to utilize the information so obtained in establishing standards that will express the true value of cotton.

Mr. MANN. I understood that; but I can not see anything in this bill that is likely to do that.

This is what I wanted to call attention to: It is stated that probably under the same conditions you would raise a greater number of pounds of cotton per acre with staple three-quarters of an inch in length than with staples an inch in length. That may seem anomalous, but I accept that statement. If a man raises cotton with a staple three-quarters of an inch in length, he is almost sure to get as high a price as the man who raises cotton with a staple an inch in length, and if the former in a large proportion of cases gets a higher price, there will be no object in the producer raising better cotton, although there is an object to the country in having the producer of cotton or anything else raise the best quality he can successfully produce.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is putting his finger upon the situation that this bill is intended to cure. Now, when cotton with the three-fourths inch staple sells on the market for a higher price than cotton with a staple of 1¼ inches, it is due to the fact that the man who determined that grading in order to determine its value either did not know what he was doing or else was dishonestly grading.

Mr. MANN. I did not say that graded cotton was sold that way at all. The cotton sold by the farmer to the dealer in the towns is not graded. After it is graded, of course, the longer staple cotton receives the higher price, if it is in good condition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There are very few farmers who bring cotton to market who do not know the value of their cotton.

Mr. MANN. I did not dispute that. I said grading is when the cotton is passed upon by somebody who grades it. Now, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Texas, I suggest that he had better get this report from the Bureau of Markets and read it, because it is apparent that he is not posted as to what actually takes place in those primary markets down there. It develops right along that there is no proportion between the price paid for cotton to the farmer and the value of the cotton when it goes into manufacture. I do not see anything in this bill that corrects it, although there may be something.

Of course, it is a serious situation. It is a good deal easier to tell the grade of corn or wheat than it is the grade of cotton, I assume, though I do not know much about either one. I think we ought to legislate in some way, if possible, so that the dealer in the country, who in the main, I suspect, is desirous of paying a fair market price for the cotton that he buys, may be able to judge, and so that the farmer himself may be able to know enough about it to ascertain whether the dealer is on the square with him. It would not be fair for a grain merchant in the country to buy corn on the basis of rejected corn when he was really buying No. 2, and it is not fair to the cotton producer if the dealer buys cotton upon the basis of the very lowest grade, and it is not fair to the dealer if he buys cotton upon the basis of a higher grade when he is buying a cheaper cotton.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] desire five minutes?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy, and I will say a few words.

Mr. BENNET. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to tell some of these gentlemen about how the cotton business of the South is conducted in what is called the primary market. The farmer brings his cotton into the small market town. Usually there are a number of exporters represented there by agents. They are eager competitors with one another for the purchase of that cotton. Perhaps the evening before, having a view of the market, they have offered in Manchester or Havre or Bremen, or perhaps in Boston or Fall River, quite a lot of cotton; and as the market is firm, in the morning these people perhaps accept those offers. So the man in the small market town must fill his contract. These exporters' agents become eager competitors with one another for that cotton.

Now, the merchants in these small towns—the grocer, the dry-goods man, and others who have been carrying the farmers, who have accounts with them, and who are looking to the collection of those accounts when that cotton is sold—also bid for that cotton, and so far as my observation and experience go they invariably bid against one another; also with the same keenness and the same sharp competition that characterizes the representatives of the exporters, the buyers, as they are sometimes called.

The farmer will take a sample out of his bale, or will have it taken out where his cotton is weighed, and Mr. Smith will bid, we will say, 15 cents, which I suppose at the present time is a fair basis for the price of cotton. The farmer takes his sample to Mr. Jones, who realizes perhaps that 15 cents is the value, but he is anxious to sell some goods or to collect a debt and he says, "I will give you 15⅛ cents a pound." So he goes about from one man to another and they bid on that cotton, and the fact that the farmer usually gets full value for his cotton is pretty well attested by the fact that you can not find 2 per cent of the operators in cotton who have accumulated money. The margin is extremely narrow. Now, I am not a dealer in cotton. I am a producer of cotton in a small way, but I know how it is sold and that it usually brings the full market value. The farmer knows from the appearance of his cotton what the grade of it is. He has also gone to some merchant or banker and has looked at a file of telegraphic commercial news dispatches that have come in that morning, giving the quotations, and he knows the precise value of his cotton, or pretty nearly so, and he knows the grade of it very well indeed, and he usually gets the value of it.

Now, my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has been very greatly bothered by the question of grade. Call it the type, if you please. Change it from the word "grade." There are types A, B, C, D, E, F, and G. Now type E, for instance, would be middling cotton. The trade generally know that. Wherever they have these arbitrary signs, the trade generally knows what is meant. And middling cotton is middling cotton, as my friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has repeatedly said, on its appearance. It is middling because of its comparative freedom from broken leaves or trash of any kind that detracts from its appearance.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Stains?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; stains class differently. You may have a middling stained, which is a different class of cotton, as my friend [Mr. LEVER] knows very well; but you may also have other sorts of middling cotton, which, as I have tried to explain, is determined by the appearance of the cotton, not its spinning quality. We have middling upland, and we have middling long staple, which refers to its appearance. We may have middling upland cotton with a staple three-quarters of an inch, and we may have middling cotton with a staple an inch and three-quarters, and I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the producer knows when he has produced that long-staple cotton, and he gets the value of it. They are endeavoring to improve the quality of their product by planting selected seed. They pay high prices for long-staple seed, and every year I see advertised in my home papers the Prolific, and this, that, or the other type of cottonseed.

Mr. FESS. Will my friend yield for one question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Why should I be interested in different grades, if they are not determined by the price that the cotton will command in the market?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, well, let the gentleman get the word "grade" out of his mind. You may have two cottons of the same appearance. One is worth more money than the other, and the men in the trade know it; worth more because of better spinning quality, due to length and strength of staple.

Mr. FESS. Why should I be interested in the different types, if it is not because one will cost more than the other? Why should I vote for a bill that pretends to protect the producer or the purchaser, if it is not in the price paid for the thing that is bought?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think I can leave to my persuasive friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to tell the gentleman why he should vote for this bill.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] desire to use some of his own time before I resume and conclude?

Mr. LEVER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, this measure is one of great importance to all men engaged in legitimate cotton business, and I trust that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] will not continue to oppose it. This bill provides for a fair and intelligent settlement of disputes that arise from day to day between the buyer and seller of cotton. It is somewhat on the order of the grain-standard bill that we passed through this House. We found it necessary to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to determine the grade or to settle disputes growing out of disagreements concerning grades in cotton-future transactions. I had the honor of suggesting the provision in the cotton-futures act which provided for the settlement of disputes of this character. Under the old system, if one party to the future contract on the New York Cotton Exchange should say that the grade in question is strict good middling and the other should say, "No; it is good ordinary," and if they could not agree, a committee of the cotton exchange would determine the grade, and from that committee's decision there was no appeal. Just think of that gentlemen of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be finally settled by the inspector; whatever he says about it will settle it?

Mr. HEFLIN. He will have authority given to him by the Secretary of Agriculture, and he will be an expert grader and classifier.

Mr. MADDEN. You can appeal from his decision to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes; that could be done.

Mr. MADDEN. By the time you get that done the cotton will be made into cloth.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; it would not take long to get a decision as to the grade. The expert grader and classifier could pass on a large number of cases in a day. The gentleman must remember that the only thing that the Department of Agriculture will have to do is to declare the grade.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it proposed to put the inspectors under bond by this bill? In the grain inspection in our State every grain inspector has to give a hundred thousand dollar bond to guarantee that the grain inspected by him is what he fixes it. If when the grain arrives at its destination it turns out to be some other grade, a lower grade, the purchaser pays for the lower grade and the man who is on the bond of the inspector is responsible for the difference in the grades.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. In section 9 it reads as follows:

That whenever a dispute arises as to the classification of any cotton which has been sold, offered for sale, consigned for sale, delivered for transportation, or transported in commerce any party interested in such transaction may refer the question of the true classification of said cotton to the Secretary of Agriculture for determination.

Does that mean that if A sells to B and then it is purchased by C and then sold to a broker, and finally either one of these men says it is not the grade that is called for, can that specific consignment of cotton be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture, and is the Secretary of Agriculture the court of last resort? Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, the purpose of the bill is to authorize the Department of Agriculture to determine the grade for buyer and seller whenever and wherever a disagreement is had between them as to the grade in question. If you buy a thousand bales of cotton from me and 500 are of the middling grade and 200 are of the strict middling grade and 200 of the grade known as ordinary, and the other 100 bales are good ordinary, we have four grades. I want you to pay me for the cotton according to the grades that I have mentioned. But you say I do not agree that these grades are what you think them to be. Then the department, if we desire it to act, will without knowing you or me decide just what the grades in dispute really are.

Surely gentlemen on that side of the House will not continue to oppose such a meritorious measure.

Mr. MEEKER. Then the gentleman means to say that the Department of Agriculture is the court of last resort as to the actual grades of cotton.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; in cases that are appealed to it, just as it determines now disputes regarding grades of cotton on future contracts. The difference is this bill has reference to sales of actual cotton—spot deals.

Mr. MEEKER. One question more. Could a dispute of that sort be settled between the farmer and the storekeeper if a dispute should arise between them as to the grade of cotton?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; any buyer or seller would have the right to have grades that could not be agreed upon determined by the Department of Agriculture. And the knowledge that the cotton producer can, if he is not satisfied with the grade fixed by the buyer, appeal to the Department of Agriculture, will have a very wholesome effect upon the expert classer and grader.

Now the seller who is without knowledge as to cotton grades is at the mercy of the expert classer and grader employed to represent the buyer. [Applause.] Through this very system the cotton producers of the South have lost millions and millions of dollars.

The producer is entitled to know the truth as to the grade and character of cotton that he has for sale, and we should see to it that every safeguard necessary be thrown about the marketing of this important product, to the end that fair treatment and justice are accorded the cotton farmers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I heard my genial friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] tell how sharp the competition was in the purchase of cotton in Texas, and I have no doubt that his statements are correct. The very fact that he makes them is sufficient evidence of that, of course. I have before me Bulletin No. 457 of the United States Department of Agriculture, recently issued by the Office of Markets, and I desire to quote from it with reference to the prices paid for cotton in Texas. I am not going to read it all, but I will take for example low middling December. The range in price is from 9.09 cents per pound for Texas to 12.10 cents per pound for South Carolina, a range of 301 points. Allowing for a variation of 50 points for freight, it is still found that Texas for that month is 250 points out of line, and $12.50 per bale lower than South Carolina. I suspect that the competition described by our genial friend from Texas is not so bitter as is the competition in the smaller State of South Carolina. At any rate, according to this report, and they have the figures to back it up, producers of cotton in Texas on the average are getting about $12.50 per bale less than they would get if they were producing in South Carolina, over and above the difference in freight transportation to the East. Here is a little item of interest in reference to Alabama, which does not reflect upon anybody, but which gives a reason why something ought to be done so that people may know the character of the cotton they are buying. For October in Alabama strict good ordinary cotton averaged 13.51 cents per pound. That is the lowest grade. Strict good middling averaged 13.47 cents per pound, less than the lower grade, and, says the bulletin, "the latter grade sold for 20 cents less per bale than the former," which means that the higher grade sold for 20 cents less than the low grade. On the basis of New Orleans differences it was actually worth $7.50 per bale more, so the bulletin informs us. Again, low middling averaged 13.34 cents and strict low middling, a higher grade, 13.19 cents, a lower price, and middling, 13.32 cents. Middling cotton sold on the average for less than low middling, though it is two grades higher. During the same month in South Carolina, so that we may pass these courtesies around, low middling averaged 13.25 cents and strict low middling, a higher grade, 13.18 cents, a lower price. Strict low middling was actually worth at least 25 points, or $1.25 per bale, lower than low middling. While it was worth more, it sold for less. Of course, in the end when this cotton gets to the manufacturer, and for that matter long before it gets to the manufacturer, the prices adjust themselves as between the different grades of cotton, but apparently, notwithstanding the sharp competition in Texas between the grocer and the candlestick maker and the market man and other experts in cotton, cotton there sells in many cases, the low grade, for no more and no less than the high grade, and all of it about $12.50 per bale less than it is really worth.

Mr. SHERWOOD. By what authority was this cotton inspected that the gentleman has told us about?

Mr. MANN. The Office of Markets under the authority of Congress, with an appropriation made by this House, undertook to ascertain the facts. They took samples of cotton where sales were made in the primary markets, obtained the prices, and gathered together the data. I do not remember how many thousand cases they had, but there were thousands of these samples taken, so that they say that their report probably represents the average for the different States.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That is, this cotton is already inspected under Government authority, as I understand the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Oh, this cotton was not inspected at all. Samples were taken and the samples were sent here, not the original cotton. This has nothing to do with the sale of the original cotton. They inspected the samples when they were brought here, but the original cotton had not then been graded. It was because it was not graded that the differences in these prices existed, partly because it was not graded, and, possibly, partly because the grading does not affect the most important value feature of cotton, and that is the length of the staple. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture for several years have suspected that the conditions outlined in this report from which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has read have existed. It was that suspicion which induced the Agricultural Committee to begin the study of some plan by which we could remedy the situation which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has so well described. Testimony came to the Committee on Agriculture that experts had found that in certain local cotton markets the higher grade of cotton, higher in point of value, higher in point of grade, was selling in that market on the same day for a price less than the lower grade. It was that very fact which attracted the attention of the Committee on Agriculture to the problem involved here of providing machinery, if possible, through which the farmer, the producer, might know the value of that which he is selling, and the purchaser likewise might know the value of it.

It is clearly apparent from the investigation of the Department of Agriculture, as disclosed here this morning by the gentleman from Illinois, that there is great necessity for the standardization of the methods of handling cotton in the United States. Whether this bill will bring that about is a question, of course, of judgment. We believe—those of us who have studied the proposition and who have agreed unanimously in reporting this bill—that it has in it at least the elements out of which we will start in the direction of the better standardization of the methods of handling cotton in this country. It is perfectly evident that when the cotton of the higher grade is selling on the market for less than cotton of the lower grade—and I am using the term "grade" here to describe value as well as actual grades—that there is something wrong; that either the grader, whose business it is through his expertness to determine what the grade of that cotton is, is incompetent to grade, or, if competent, he is dishonestly grading. You can not escape that conclusion.

Now, for myself I do not believe that a large per cent of the cotton graders of this country are dishonest. I do think, however, that a very large per cent of the men who sample the cotton of the farmer in the little primary markets of the South and report the grade and fix the standard upon which its value is determined are incompetent to do that business. We are proposing in this bill to prevent the shipment of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce unless that cotton is graded in accordance with the standards of grades fixed by the Federal Department of Agriculture. But we are doing more than that. We are proposing to give authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to license competent graders, who shall be in the closest contact with the primary markets upon which the farmer's cotton is sold, in order that as far as possible under existing conditions we will bring to the man who produces as well as the man who buys this great product the largest possible information with respect to the elements and factors that make the value of that product. Now, that is all there is in this proposal.

The other provisions of the bill are more or less words. That is what we are trying to do. We have had established standards here since 1909 for cotton. Those standards represent the best judgment of the cotton experts of this country as saying what they purport to say. The great future-cotton exchanges of this country, the clearing houses of the cotton business, have been compelled by law to use these standards. They voluntarily accepted them before they were made to do it by law. A majority of the spot-cotton exchanges of the country which do not deal in future transactions at all have been so well satisfied with the representative character of these standards fixed by the Department of Agriculture for cotton that they, too, have adopted them and accepted them as the basis of their transactions. What we are trying to do in this bill is to go further than that and to compel all the parties interested in cotton to accept these standards.

What we are trying to do again in this bill is to place between the producer of cotton and the consumer of cotton a disinterested tribunal of experts whose business it will be, as far as humanly possible, to fix upon the factors that make the value of cotton and make that information valuable to seller and buyer. We are trying to remedy the situation that is described in the bulletin which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has read. I do not know that we are succeeding. My personal opinion is that we will greatly benefit the situation if we do not entirely remedy it. We are following in this legislation a precedent established by this Congress in its last session when it passed the grain-standards act, through which we hope to accomplish, and we have every reason to believe that we will accomplish, for the grain trade what we are undertaking to accomplish for the cotton trade in this bill.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I see that in section 2 the word "commerce" shall be construed to mean commerce among the several States. That appears to limit the scope of the bill. Now, in section 3 the word "commerce" is not used, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate, and so forth, all the cotton that is produced. Now, I would like to know if under the Federal Constitution he has the right to regulate the control of contracts for cotton that is sold on the spot.

Mr. MANN. That is just investigation.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Should not this section here say "cotton that is going through the channels of commerce"?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that we are undertaking in section 3 to confer authority upon the Secretary of Agriculture which he now has, I may say, because we are appropriating money in each current appropriation bill for that very purpose; but we are seeking through section 3 to give the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to get the fundamental basic facts with reference to cotton in all of its phases, the fundamental facts upon which we can predicate other legislation in the future, and from which we can make economic studies in the future. It is merely an investigation and not a regulation of the situation.

I trust, gentlemen of the committee, that we have made the situation sufficiently plain to convince gentlemen of the wisdom of undertaking this kind of effort through the Federal Government. If the facts as set forth in this bulletin are true, and we have no reason to doubt them, we need legislation of this character. Probably we need to go further than we are going here, but at least this is a start in the right direction. And I take it that a further study of the economics of the cotton business will probably induce a later Congress to further legislate on this proposition.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In a general way, what portion of the cotton growers would know the grade of cotton when it is ready for sale?

Mr. LEVER. Of course, in answer to that question I would say that my opinion is not worth a great deal more than the gentleman's, but probably a little more, because I am from the cotton belt; but I would say not over 5 per cent—and I would like the southern Members here to hear this—that probably not over 5 per cent of the producers of cotton have any very great familiarity with what is known as the grades of cotton. Is that too large?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think that is a very conservative statement.

Mr. FESS. So that this bill is to protect the man who produces the cotton from selling the cotton at a lower figure than the grade would justify in the market?

Mr. LEVER. Exactly; and to that end to give him information as to the value of that which he produces.

Now, when I say that I doubt whether more than 5 per cent of the farmers of the South have any great familiarity with grades I trust my statement may not be regarded as a reflection upon the intelligence of the farmers of the South.

I feel that they are as intelligent as any other class of farmers in any other section of the country, but the matter of determining the value of cotton is a highly technical proposition and requires large expertness in working out the factors that affect that value.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Gladly.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me the gentleman went a little further in his statement than he intended to. Of course, every farmer in the South knows that if cotton is left out in the rain and gets discolored its grade is lowered; they all know that if it is dirty and has sand mixed with it and is not cleanly picked that affects the grade.

Mr. LEVER. Of course. If the gentleman will remember, I said the farmer had no large familiarity with the subject of grade. Of course, the cotton farmer does know that to leave his cotton out in the rain or weather, or to pick it when it is too wet, or dirty, with too much trash in it, or when a storm comes and fills it with trash, that affects its value. But, taking a season like this, when we have had no unusual weather conditions excepting the flood, which did not affect the grade of it, we have had an excellent season, and the grade of cotton is practically all the same. We have not had any great diversity of grades of cotton at all. The farmer suffers most in misgrading of cotton when you have bad seasons and a consequent variety of grades. He always suffers most when the value of his grade is lowered, and there it is that we ought to protect him most.

Mr. MANN. Without being a judge of cotton, I should suppose that the grading of cotton, like the grading of anything else, was a matter of high expert service.

Mr. LEVER. I said that a moment ago,

Mr. MANN. Of course, you can not expect the farmer to have that expert service outside the farming business.

Mr. LEVER. Of course.

Mr. FESS. My question was not intended to reflect upon the intelligence of anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, as I think I have been very fair in yielding time to other gentlemen in the last hour, I will consider it a favor if I am allowed to proceed for eight minutes without interruption, in order to point out the defects that I started awhile ago to point out.

This is an attempt by statute—one of those always unsuccessful attempts—to substitute machinery for the competence, experience, and knowledge that come with trading in business. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] said that the Liverpool exchanges had declined to accept our grading, and that he did not know why. I will tell him why. It is because anywhere, everywhere, and at any time people who have been educated in English-speaking countries are more willing to send their disputes to the ordinary courts of their countries, to which they are accustomed, than to any political division of the Government. I walked down the steps the other day, and out here I saw the statue of Thomas Jefferson, a great man, and I said to myself, "Old man, they have got you in the right place—outside of the House of Representatives, with your back to the Democratic side." [Laughter.] And that is where he has been put by the action of this House almost every day, because he was the man who said that "that country is the best governed which is the least governed."

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I declined to yield to the House, and I regret that I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I just wanted to correct the gentleman's history.

Mr. BENNET. Even for that I can not yield. [Laughter.]

Now, the reason why they will not accept our grades abroad under this bill is found in two provisions. One is the provision that the gentleman from South Carolina alluded to on page 3, which gives the Secretary of Agriculture the right to change these grades, it is quite true on comparatively long notice, but nevertheless the power is there, and while we can regulate things in our own country, yet in Liverpool and Bremen and Rotterdam and Antwerp and ports in other foreign countries their cotton is not necessarily strictly spot; it is all more or less future; and they are not subject to the right of the Secretary of Agriculture to arbitrarily change the grades.

And here is the other trouble: On page 4, section 5, it is provided that "reasonable variation from the official standards may be permitted under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe." The gentlemen may say there always must be small variations, and that is true, but the course of education of English-speaking peoples has been such that they know intuitively that the best way to cope with those small variations is by the give and take of the traders, and that the most harmful thing to free trade between peoples, between the buyer and the seller, is the interposition of an arbitrary exercise of an arm of the government. Therefore when people abroad are asked to abide by our standard, rather than their own, they refuse to do it, because under the British method of procedure, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] pointed out, their grades are the grades that are established by usage and custom on the part of the people.

Now, we give our Secretary of Agriculture the right to establish arbitrary grades, nine of them, and to change them from time to time, and we provide that no cotton shall be sold except according to those grades, and that even where there are these differences that always come up, these hair-line deviations, even there the buyer and the seller are prohibited from agreeing on those matters, and that if they are to sell except in accordance with exact grade they must sell under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. BENNET. I can not refrain from recognizing the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is mistaken about that. If the gentleman will look at another provision of the bill, he will find that the buyer and seller may sell on sample or type by mutual agreement.

Mr. BENNET. Well, I think that even that is controlled by this proviso that I have read.

Mr. Chairman, we have gone insane on this question of regulating everything by statute in this country [applause], and the marvel of it is that we have gone insane on the question at a time when that party is dominant which, through its historic past at least, has been supposed to be the custodian of the idea of the freest and widest democracy.

And now even the chief product of the section from which the majority of that party comes is to be interdicted in its free buying and selling, and the men of an English-speaking country, contrary to our past under which we have prospered and developed, contrary to all our customs and habits, which are sound customs and good habits, are, in connection with the traffic in this greatest money crop of our country to be taken away from the course of dealing to which they are accustomed, the ordinary give and take of the market, of the trade between the buyer and the seller, and even in cases of dispute are to be taken away from the courses and the courts with which they are familiar, and relegated to an arm of the Government which may and frequently does change every four years, and where politics, using that word for the moment in its most sinister sense, can and sometimes does creep in, and where it far more frequently creeps in than in the courts of any State in this land.

I am opposed to this bill not because it affects that particular part of the country from which I come, for it does not. There is a cotton exchange in the city of New York; but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] said promptly, a long time since in the discussion, that seven years ago, when these grades were established, the cotton exchange in the city which I represent in part at once accepted those grades and has been using them ever since.

Neither does this affect the much-mooted question of the sale of cotton on what is known as futures. This bill, as I understand it, relates only to spot cotton, and therefore we can discuss it without any question of extrinsic matters, on the clean-cut question of principle, and that I have had pleasure in doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

Mr. LEVER. That can not be done under the rule.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I want to correct the gentleman's quotation from Jefferson.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of the "United States cotton standards act."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On July 5, 1916, I introduced a bill for the construction of a military highway——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the bill under consideration, as required by the rule in the five-minute debate.

Mr. RAKER. I am not going to discuss it. I want to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. RAKER. I have five minutes on this motion to strike out.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the bill. I have no opposition to the gentleman getting his chance, but I do not think he ought to take it now.

Mr. RAKER. This is on the motion to strike out the last word. It will only take me a moment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is one of 435 Members of the House. He is not entitled to any greater privileges than the rest. If he wants to delay the House, very well, but he can not do it unless he comes within the rule.

Mr. LEVER. I wish the gentleman from California would let us read the bill. He can get his unanimous consent in the House. I do not want to object myself——

Mr. RAKER. I am satisfied that nobody will object.

Mr. LEVER. But I will say to the gentleman from California that this is the first call that the Committee on Agriculture has had, and will be the last one, except next Wednesday.

Mr. RAKER. Under those circumstances I will not take up any time, but will submit my request later.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the ginning, wrapping, baling, sampling, weighing, handling, classifying according to grade and otherwise, compressing, tare, moisture content, certification, identification, warehousing, storage, transportation, marketing, and utilization of cotton and its products.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I just want to take a moment's time to correct the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] in his quotation from Jefferson. As I remember it, Jefferson said, writing to John W. Eppes:

I hold the world is governed too much. I hold that when we have established justice and so legislated as to prevent the strong from preying upon the weak, then the least governed country is the best governed country.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CARAWAY: Amend by striking out the period at the end of line 20 and inserting a colon and adding the following proviso: "Provided, That none of the provisions and penalties prescribed in sections 13 or 14 of this act shall be applicable to the provisions and acts called for in said section 3."

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Arkansas is willing to make that amendment a part of section 13 or 14, I think I shall have no objection to it. It seems to me it comes out of order at this point in the bill, because the sections may be changed in the meantime.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no objection. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, from time to time, to establish and promulgate standards of cotton by which its quality or value may be judged or determined, including its grade, length of staple, strength of staple, color, and such other qualities, properties, and conditions as may be standardized in practical form, which, for the purposes of this act, shall be known as the "Official cotton standards of the United States," and to adopt, change, or replace the standard for any grade of cotton established under the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909 (35 Stats. L., p. 251), and acts supplementary thereto: Provided, That any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall not be changed or replaced within a period less than one year from and after the date of the promulgation thereof by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided further, That no change or replacement of any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall become effective until after one year's public notice thereof, which notice shall specify the date when the same is to become effective. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to prepare practical forms of the official cotton standards which shall be established by him, and to furnish such practical forms from time to time, upon request, to any person, the cost thereof, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, to be paid by the person requesting the same, and to certify such practical forms under the seal of the Department of Agriculture and under the signature of the said Secretary, thereto affixed by himself or by some official or employee of the Department of Agriculture thereunto duly authorized by the said Secretary; and he is authorized to make rules and regulations governing the use and condemnation of said practical forms.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I do not know much about the cotton-farming industry, but do you have the same conditions that we do in the wheat belt, have cotton that would be called no grade, and which is still marketable?

Mr. LEVER. There is a class of cotton in the South called "dogtail" cotton. It is not standardized; it is a very low class of cotton, but yet it has some value, such as making padding for horse collars, and so forth; but it is not a cotton that would ever be standardized by any grade.

Mr. MEEKER. Then that would not be affected by this bill at all?

Mr. LEVER. No; because it never would be standardized.

Mr. MEEKER. I asked the question because I see that before a change of grade is made there must be a year's notice, and suppose something should occur to the cotton crop which would destroy a lot of it as far as grading cotton is concerned?

Mr. LEVER. In the first place, there never could occur such a catastrophe as would destroy the grade of all the cotton in a section.

Mr. MEEKER. I did not mean all of it.

Mr. LEVER. Or a large per cent, because the Department of Agriculture is authorized in this act and other acts not only to standardize such cotton as it has already standardized for 18 grades, but it is authorized to standardize the lowest grades of cotton, except such stuff as no Secretary would want to standardize.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That no person shall ship, or deliver for shipment, in commerce any cotton in contemplation or in pursuance of any sale, offer for sale, or consignment for sale, whether by grade or other class, or in any other manner, under any name, description, or designation which is false or misleading in any particular: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall prevent the shipment or delivery for shipment, otherwise lawful, of any cotton which is sold, offered for sale, or consigned for sale, on sample or type, without reference to grade or other class, under any name, description, or designation which is not false or misleading.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, strike out the word "herein," and in lieu thereof insert the words "in this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5 strike out the period at the end of line 11 and in lieu thereof insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 12, strike out the words "or type," and strike out, in line 13, the words "without reference to grade or other class," and in lieu thereof insert a comma after the word "sample," and the words "or one other than by a grade or other class within the scope of a standard which shall have become effective on type or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to classify cotton according to grade or otherwise and to certificate the grade or other class thereof, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe. Any such license may be suspended or revoked by the Secretary of Agriculture whenever he is satisfied, after opportunity afforded to the licensee for a hearing, that such licensee has failed to classify cotton correctly, in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States, or has violated any provision of this act, or of the rules and regulations made hereunder, so far as the same may relate to him, or that he has used his license or allowed it to be used for any improper purpose whatsoever. Pending investigation, the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he deems necessary, may suspend a license temporarily without hearing. Whenever the owner or person in possession of any cotton which has been classified, and its classification certified, by a classifier licensed under this act, is dissatisfied with such classification, he may, within a reasonable time, to be fixed in the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue certificates, showing the true classification of the cotton involved in such appeals, signed by him, or, in his name, by some officer or officers of the Department of Agriculture designated by him. For the purposes of sections 5 and 6 of this act, any cotton shall be deemed to conform to the grade or other class of the official cotton standards of the United States set forth in a certificate for such cotton, issued in compliance with this act and the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, obtained and used in good faith, without fraud or collusion, and a statement that it is of such grade or other class shall not be deemed to be false or misleading.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, lines 14, 15, and 16, strike out the words "has failed to classify cotton correctly in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States" and in lieu thereof insert "is incompetent and has knowingly or carelessly classified cotton improperly."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 22, after the word "of," insert the words "or persons interested in the transaction involving."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 8, after the word "shall," insert a comma and the words "in behalf of any person prosecuting for violation of either of said sections."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to certain language in the bill, beginning in line 22, page 6:

Whenever the owner or person in possession of any cotton which has been classified, and its classification certified, by a classifier licensed under this act, is dissatisfied with such classification, he may, within a reasonable time, to be fixed in the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of Agriculture.

This is the question that I desire to propound: As the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] knows, a great many farmers in our section of the country raise cotton and are absolutely dependent on a quick sale of that cotton for money with which to pay their current expenses. Suppose an incompetent classifier were to put a classification on, say, 10 bales of cotton in the hands of a farmer, which he knew was not a true classification of the cotton. Rather than be delayed in getting his money, although he knows his classification is based upon error or upon an attempt to defraud, he would be most likely to accept the classification. Under the provisions of this bill, if he desired to make an appeal, how long would he have to wait before he could get a decision giving him a true classification of his cotton?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the question of the gentleman from Georgia is an important one, and my answer to it is this, that it is proposed with the appropriation provided in this bill to locate boards of expert classifiers at the principal cotton markets of the South. There would probably be one or two in the State of Georgia, and there would undoubtedly be one in the State of South Carolina, and probably several in the great State of Texas.

There will be enough of these boards located, with headquarters established, to expedite as much as possible the consideration of transactions such as the gentleman has described. Just how long in actual practice it would take would be a matter to be determined largely by the distance that the complaining cotton seller lived from the nearest headquarters. I should think it ought not to take over a day or so, but that is somewhat of a guess.

Mr. HOWARD. I take it that the practical execution of this law will be about in this way, that all cotton buyers will stand examination and classify under the provisions of this act to grade cotton.

Mr. LEVER. That is correct.

Mr. HOWARD. That will be the actual cotton buyer in the market buying the staple?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. It occurs to me that that class of classifiers and buyers would find it to their interest to give the farmer, as they have been doing ever since we have been raising cotton, the lowest classification that he is willing to take. Under the provisions of this act, if he puts that classification on, he can resort to the same means that he resorts to now. If there is no competition in that particular market, the buyers there will put on a low classification. Let us suppose there is only one cotton buyer at a particular market, and he the only licensed classifier. The farmer is absolutely at the mercy of that particular classifier as to the price that he will obtain for his cotton.

Mr. LEVER. But the gentleman overlooks the fact that the classifier would hold his license only upon condition that he conducted his business efficiently and honestly.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand.

Mr. LEVER. And if he drops into the habit of deliberately misgrading, his license is liable to be taken from him by the Secretary of Agriculture; and in addition to that he is liable to the penalties of this bill. Of course there will be, I have no doubt, some dishonesty in this business, as there is in every business, but I think we have reduced that to the minimum.

Mr. HOWARD. I am heartily in favor of this bill, but the proposition that I am trying to bring to the attention of the distinguished chairman of this committee is this, that we ought to have some method of expediting the appeal from a classification and a near-by settlement. In other words, there ought to be some machinery set in motion in this bill, in my judgment local machinery, by which these classifications can be appealed from and the classifications settled finally as between the grower and the buyer.

Mr. LEVER. I fully agree with the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in order that I may answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman's statement entirely, but the gentleman must recognize the difficulty of the Congress of the United States legislating upon purely local propositions. What we are doing in this bill is to expedite the appeal just as much as possible, and we are providing an appropriation and giving an authority to the Secretary to locate these central boards, not in particular terms, but in general terms, so that in order to expedite such transactions we will bring our appeal board just as close to the farmer as it is possible to get it.

Mr. HOWARD. This bill provides that the appeal shall be made from the classification directly to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. That is true, but the gentleman must understand that the Secretary will act through his force in the field.

Mr. HOWARD. If that was not true, if the decision was that the appeal should be made to the board of classifiers appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture to determine this particular thing, then it would expedite it, but if a man down in South Carolina or in Georgia, in order to appeal on a 10-bale classification, must apply direct to the Secretary of Agriculture and then let the Secretary put into operation the machinery necessary to properly classify his cotton and hear his appeal, it will take so much time that the man would rather accept the original classification.

Mr. LEVER. But that is not the modus operandi at all. It will be the other way.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That whenever a dispute arises as to the classification of any cotton which has been sold, offered for sale, consigned for sale, delivered for transportation, or transported, in commerce, any party interested in such transaction may refer the question of the true classification of said cotton to the Secretary of Agriculture for determination. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying out the purposes of this section, and his findings, upon any dispute referred to him under this section, made after the parties in interest have had an opportunity to be heard by him, or such officer, officers, agent, or agents of the Department of Agriculture as he may designate, shall be accepted in the courts of the United States in all suits between such parties, or their privies, as prima facie evidence of the true classification of the cotton involved.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rivers and harbors.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rivers and harbors. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of military highways.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of military highways. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That any person who, without written authority from the Secretary of Agriculture, shall receive, use, or have in his possession, any of the practical forms furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act which do not bear the certificate provided therefor by this act, or who alters, tampers with, or in any respect changes any of the said practical forms certified as provided for by this act, or who uses any of such practical forms after they shall have been condemned by the Secretary of Agriculture, or who shall, with intent to deceive or defraud, make, receive, use, or have in his possession any simulate or counterfeit practical form or forms of any standard of any cotton established under this act, or who fails to comply with or violates any of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture governing the use of said forms, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in section 13 of this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. RAKER. You will have to keep on objecting. I will tell you that right now. It is fun on your part now, possibly.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my objection is based on this fact——

Mr. RAKER. I think I have the floor. I do not need any explanation. I would just as soon the gentleman did not explain. If he has any deep-seated reason for sitting in his seat and permitting every other gentleman to get unanimous consent——

Mr. MADDEN. I object to the gentleman's discussion of his motion. I raise the question of order.

Mr. RAKER. If he has any deep-seated reason——

Mr. MADDEN. I raise the question of order as to the gentleman's discussion of the motion. He is not discussing it.

Mr. RAKER. I am going to discuss the motion to strike out the section when I get to it.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is going to filibuster, we will commence on this side as well. We may just as well understand it. I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAKER. He will have to make it. I have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold it for a moment?

Mr. MANN. I will if you are going ahead with this bill, but not for extraneous matter.

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] that I do not propose to stand here and have my objections to a legitimate bill prevented and have other men get leave to print. It comes from the other side in the shape of objection. I am trying to be heard and I am going to be heard.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is heard more than anbody, but nobody pays any attention to what he says. He is always talking.

Mr. RAKER. That is your view of it. Others differ. Now, the gentleman can make his remarks, but I am not going to submit to them, notwithstanding he has had lots of experience. And he can make any suggestion he wants. I did not refer to him at all.

Mr. MANN. I did to him.

Mr. LEVER. Do not tie up the bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is going to filibuster, I will filibuster.

Mr. RAKER. It is not any filibuster. It is an idea to get into the RECORD what I consider legitimate.

Mr. MANN. You get more in the RECORD than any other 10 gentlemen in the House.

Mr. RAKER. That is your opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that no quorum is present. Debate is not in order. There is nothing in order until the Chair determines whether there is a quorum present. The Chair will proceed to count.

The Chair proceeded to count.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to withdraw my motion to strike out the section.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not withdraw it yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not do that, because there is a point of order of no quorum pending.

Mr. MANN. If we can proceed with this bill, I will withdraw the point of no quorum; but not to consider extraneous matters.

Mr. RAKER. We will proceed with the bill; and the gentleman is filibustering when he objects to my withdrawing the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to strike out the section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from South Carolina a question. I have tried in the short time this bill has been under consideration to find a definition of the expression "practical forms," as it appears in line 1, page 9. Is it contained in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. There is no definition of the term "practical forms" in the bill.

But I may say to the gentleman that these words have a well-recognized meaning. If the gentleman will come to my office some time I will show him the forms representing the nine grades in a box, each grade set off by itself.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman, I have no doubt, has a serious purpose in connection with this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BENNET. And in this section the committee has inserted a description of a crime. In lines 14 and 15 is the language "shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in section 13 of this act." Now, the gentleman is a very excellent lawyer——

Mr. LEVER. The "gentleman" never served long enough to do anybody any harm as a lawyer.

Mr. BENNET. I think what service he has had has been a benefit. You would never convict anybody under this section of having in his possession any of the practical forms unless there is a well-defined description of what the practical forms are.

Mr. LEVER. But would not that be covered by section 11, which provides "That the Secretary of Agriculture shall from time to time make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act"? And, in addition to that, would it not be a matter of evidence in the court as to whether or not the party had in his possession such practical forms as the Secretary of Agriculture had put into commerce?

Mr. BENNET. Well, there might be something in that, except that this crime only adheres to those practical forms that are furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. If the gentleman will permit me, we are repeating here in section 12 the language already in the cotton-futures act touching this same proposition. The gentleman understands, of course, that it is absolutely necessary to protect the integrity of these standards and that we have got to throw around them all the safeguards of law in order to prevent tampering with them. They are very delicate, and the slightest handling of them will make them absolutely valueless as a measure of grade or value. It is absolutely necessary to protect the country against the deliberate tampering with these forms. That is what we are trying to do here.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but the gentleman is not getting where he wants, because he is attempting to make it a crime for a man to have in his possession any of the practical forms furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act, when nowhere in the act is it provided that the Secretary of Agriculture shall furnish any practical forms.

Mr. LEVER. Let me read a little further on. I read:

That any person who without written authority from the Secretary of Agriculture shall receive, use, or have in his possession any of the practical forms furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture in this act—

And so forth.

Now, then, anyone having in his possession these forms which do not bear the certificate of the Secretary, which is required by law to accompany these practical forms, will be violating the law and will undoubtedly be putting himself in danger. It is absolutely necessary that we find some way of protecting these standards, just exactly as we provide now in reference to food and drugs in this country. We are tagging it; that is all. The possession of one of these boxes containing the type that has not been tagged by the certificate of the Secretary of Agriculture will likely get its possessor into trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. After the 4th of March I shall be a practicing attorney. Suppose somebody in my town has some of these forms in his possession without having a certificate. A prosecution is commenced against him, and the case comes to me as his attorney, and I go into the question of how he is going to defend himself. The first thing that I or any other lawyer will look up will be to find out in what part of this act is described what a practical form is, and it is not here; and what is required of the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to furnishing practical forms, and I do not find it here.

Mr. LEVER. It does provide that.

Mr. BENNET. Where?

Mr. LEVER. Section 4 of the act provides—

That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, from time to time, to establish and promulgate standards of cotton by which its quality or value may be judged or determined, including its grade, length of staple, strength of staple, color, and such other qualities, properties, and conditions as may be standardized in practical form, which, for the purposes of this act, shall be known as the "Official cotton standards of the United States."

Mr. BENNET. That relates to the standardization, and not to the papers.

Mr. LEVER. There is no description of what the practical form is.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman should remember that this is a penal statute.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. But in line 18, page 3, of the act, it is provided that—

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to prepare practical forms of the official cotton standards which shall be established by him, and to furnish such practical forms from time to time, upon request, to any person, the cost thereof, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, to be paid by the person requesting the same, and to certify such practical forms under the seal of the Department of Agriculture and under the seal of the Secretary, thereto affixed by himself or by some official or employee of the Department of Agriculture thereunto duly authorized by the said Secretary; and he is authorized to make rules and regulations governing the use and condemnation of said practical forms.

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman is right. As I stated at the outset, I was not able to find it.

Mr. LEVER. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. I am free to say that in my judgment that cures the defect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That every person who forcibly assaults, resists, impedes, or interferes with any officer or employee of the United States Department of Agriculture in the execution of any duties authorized to be performed by this act, or the rules and regulations made hereunder, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARAWAY: Amend by striking out the period at the end of line 10, page 10, and inserting a colon and the following proviso:

"Provided, That none of the provisions or penalties of sections 13 and 14 of this act shall be applicable to the provisions of section 3."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "or" in line 9, and all of line 10, and insert the word "both" after the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 10, line 9, strike out all after the word "or" in line 9, and all of line 10, and insert the word "both."

Mr. RAKER. That is the same as the other section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, available until expended, for the expense of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This appropriation of $50,000 is made available until expended. How long is it anticipated that that will carry on this work?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the department originally estimated for this work $100,000. The committee thought it ought to be able to begin its organization work with $50,000. I should say that the organization under this act certainly ought to be completed within one fiscal year. I did not get any information from the department about it, but that would be my own judgment.

Mr. MANN. The grain-grading act and this act are along the same lines.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the amount that is carried in the agricultural appropriation bill this year for the grain-grading act—$500,000?

Mr. LEVER. We are carrying an appropriation of $519,000 for the enforcement of that act, but $250,000 of that is an unexpended balance.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference whether it is an unexpended balance or not. It has to come out of the Treasury. Now, if it costs half a million dollars for the grain-grading act, how does the gentleman expect to get along with $50,000 for the cotton-grading act? My observation has been that the gentlemen from cotton States always get more money than the gentlemen from the grain States, and they make a point of it.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it ought not to be as expensive to enforce the provisions of this act as it is to enforce the provisions of the grain-grading act, to start with.

Mr. MANN. This $50,000 is too much for the balance of this fiscal year and it is not enough until the end of the next fiscal year.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman is right, but of course in the Committee on Agriculture we were in no position to handle the situation. If it should be determined later, through estimates from the department, that it will need more money, I will bring it to the attention of the House if we can reach it before we finish the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill. Otherwise it will have to be taken care of in the Senate, I suppose.

Mr. MANN. If this bill becomes a law at all at this session of Congress, very likely it will be signed at 11.55 on the 4th of March, or on the 3d of March, the 4th being Sunday, I believe.

Mr. LEVER. I hope we may escape that this time.

Mr. MANN. It will then be too late to make an appropriation; and if we are diligent at this session of Congress, I trust we will not have to be here again before next December, after the 4th of March. I do not believe that $50,000 will take care of this matter from March 4 until the 1st of next December, if we can get any notion at all from the expense of carrying out the grain-grading act.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is a difference between the situations as respects the grain-grading act and this act. The department has been working upon the grain-grading proposition for almost a year now—five or six months, anyway—and has completed its organization for the work under the act. In respect to this proposition, the $50,000 will only go to completing the organization.

Mr. LEVER. I should think this amount will in all reasonableness carry out the work of organization until another appropriation can be made.

Mr. MANN. You can not make it too small to suit me.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. The gentleman's attention has already been directed to the use of the word "practical" in this bill. Those of us who have had experience in prosecutions appreciate the necessity of framing a law in such a way that there will be just as few questions in it as possible. Under this bill you leave to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture the construction of the forms, anyhow. You do not undertake in this bill to indicate to the Secretary of Agriculture how the forms shall be constructed.

Mr. LEVER. That is true, but——

Mr. SUMNERS. Now, it may be that in a prosecution the presumption that the official has done his duty will stamp these forms in such a way that the question could not be raised in a trial as to whether or not a given form upon which a prosecution was based was in fact a practical form or not. But you put into this bill in every prosecution the question whether a given form upon which the prosecution is based is a practical form or not. Now, the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman is this, that you unnecessarily and without profit put into this bill a question which would confront a prosecutor in the event that a prosecution should be based upon an alleged violation; and if you will just eliminate the word "practical" wherever it appears in the bill, you will meet all the purposes of this legislation, it seems to me, and will eliminate the possibility of this question arising in the event of a prosecution for an alleged violation of the law.

Mr. LEVER. I think I can appreciate and sympathize with the gentleman's position. In the first clause the Secretary is authorized to establish and promulgate these standards in a practical form. In addition to that he is authorized and directed to prepare practical forms of the official standards which shall be established by him, and to furnish these from time to time to persons who are willing to pay for them. In addition to that, on page 3, line 24, he is authorized and directed—

To certify such practical forms under the seal of the Department of Agriculture and under the signature of the said Secretary, thereto affixed by himself or by some official or employee of the Department of Agriculture thereunto duly authorized by the said Secretary; and he is authorized to make rules and regulations governing the use and condemnation of said practical forms.

Now, you have authorized him to prepare these practical forms, but the fact of these forms being the practical forms authorized by this act will be evidenced by the signature and certificate of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I think that would relieve the situation which the gentleman is disturbed about.

Mr. SUMNERS. I recognize that it is not clearly fatal to a prosecution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS. I ask for one minute more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS. I recognize that it is not fatal in the event of a prosecution, but you must leave some discretion to the Secretary of Agriculture. Of course, the gentleman does not mean it, but it is a reflection to say to a man who must prepare a form that it must be a practical form.

Mr. LEVER. What we desire to bring out by the use of the word "practical" is that the type box shall be of such a character as to visualize the grades of cotton.

Mr. SUMNERS. You do not so describe it here.

Mr. LEVER. It is almost impossible to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words in order to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. There is an unusual expression on line 5, page 4, and I want to see whether it is a typographical error. It is "and he is authorized to make rules and regulations governing the use and condemnation of said practical forms."

Mr. LEVER. Yes; the Secretary has the power to make rules governing the use of the practical forms and the regulations governing their condemnation. It may be that the Secretary might want to change the standards after 12 months' notice, and they would then go out of use, and he might want to condemn them, and he would want to be sure and take the same precaution in condemning them as you would other property.

Mr. BENNET. I do not want to criticize the gentleman's use of language, but if the gentleman means abrogation, I think that would be the better word. I do not think you condemn a thing unless there is something evil about it, but you can abrogate anything that is obsolete.

Mr. LEVER. I do not pretend to a nice discrimination in the use of words, but you do condemn property and rights of way.

Mr. BENNET. It is simply a question of taste. If the gentleman is satisfied with it, I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That this act shall be effective immediately, except sections 5, 6, 7, 9, and 13, which shall become and be effective on and after September 1, 1916.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 3, strike out the word "September" and in lieu thereof insert the word "August."

Mr. MANN. It is not a great while to get this thing in shape. When the gentleman reported the bill before, I take it that it was reported in May—I do not know when it was introduced—but he proposed to make it go into effect the 1st of September.

Mr. LEVER. We make it August because August is the beginning of the cotton year in the trade.

Mr. MANN. Was not it the beginning of the cotton year when the bill was reported before?

Mr. LEVER. No; it has been changed since. I was informed of that fact lately by an expert in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Some of the cotton begins to move in August.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 4, strike out the word "sixteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventeen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15913) establishing uniform standards and classification of cotton, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report the same back forthwith by striking out the proviso on page 4, section 5, and the latter two provisos in section 4, on page 3.

Mr. LEVER. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BENNET moves to recommit the bill with instructions to report the same back forthwith by striking out the proviso on page 4, section 5, and the last two provisos in section 4, page 3.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 306. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of the deferred installments due on the purchase of tracts of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma.

INVESTIGATION UNDER HOUSE RESOLUTION 429.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 430.

Resolved, That in the performance of the duties imposed upon it by reference to it of House resolution 429, the Committee on Rules shall have the power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance as may be necessary. The expenses incurred hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GARRETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

STANDARDIZATION OF SERUMS.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up by direction of the Committee on Agriculture the bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that there is no advantage in starting this bill to-night, that he will not make any progress, but I will withdraw the point of order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill H. R. 16788?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman to state what the subject of the remarks will be?

Mr. RAKER. They are upon House bill 16788, and relate entirely to that bill and its operation.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the bill?

Mr. RAKER. It is a bill for the construction of a military highway, and the remarks refer to that bill in all its various forms.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say now while I have the floor, and I have the right to speak, that my reason for objecting to the request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] on previous occasions was that he was trying to inject a foreign matter into the consideration of a bill that was pending before the House. Now that that is out of the way I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed for one minute——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to that.

STANDARDIZATION OF SERUMS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes, and under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15914, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15914 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 4, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

THURSDAY, January 4, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for those things that are fixed and changeless, and we thank Thee for the things that are ever changing and ever new. Out of the one we receive our inspiration and our hope; out of the other we build our character and shape our destiny. Grant us grace this day. Grant that in this sacred moment we may enter into the realm of closed questions with God and go out into the battle of life imbued with Thy spirit and guided with Thy truth. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BRADY. I present a resolution adopted by the State Board of Land Commissioners of the State of Idaho petitioning the Federal Government to grant to that State 1,000,000 acres of unappropriated lands to be sold as other State lands, the proceeds of which sale shall be devoted to the building and improving of wagon roads in the State of Idaho. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Senate Committee on Public Lands for consideration in connection with the bill introduced by me December 5, being Senate bill 7042, granting to the State of Idaho 2,000,000 acres of lands to aid in the construction and maintenance of public roads in the State of Idaho.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be received and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRADY. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of St. Maries, Idaho, praying for an embargo on food and leather leaving this country. I move that the petition be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I present, in the form of a memorial, three telegrams from organized-labor associations of California with respect to oriental immigration and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., January 3, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As you doubtless know, organized labor of California is as united as ever in the demand for really effective legislation which will bar all Asiatic laborers from our shores. We therefore strongly favor the House language of the immigration bill, which would prevent Hindus and persons ineligible to citizenship from entering the United States. We also urge you to stand firmly for your amendment, which would permit only citizens or those who have declared their intention to become citizens to send for their wives.

CALIFORNIA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
DANIEL C. MURPHY, President,
PAUL SCHARRENBERG, Secretary.
STATE BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL,
P. H. MCCARTHY, President,
O. A. TVEITMOE, Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator from Missouri if this is a unanimous report of the committee?

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to pay out of any money belonging to the Chippewas of Minnesota to Mary Lyons Pineau, the heirs of Julia B. Oakes, and to Jane B. Jones such amount or amounts as would have been paid to them had they not been stricken from the rolls, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment providing for an increase in the wages, salaries, or compensation of all persons employed in the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the country, intended to be proposed by him to the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill (H. He also submitted an amendment providing for an increase in the wages, salaries, or compensation of all persons employed in the Indian Service of the country, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. FISH-CULTURAL STATIONS.

Mr. LIPPITT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to present a notice under the rule, and ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The notice was read, as follows:

Senate resolution.

I hereby give notice that on Friday, January 5, or as soon thereafter as possible, I will move to amend Rule XII of the standing rules of the Senate by adding thereto an additional paragraph, to read as follows:

"No Senator shall be permitted to pair with another Senator, or be excused from voting because of the absence of any other Senator. Any Senator being absent when any vote is taken may have the RECORD show how he would vote if present, such announcement to be made upon the calling of the roll, or at any time thereafter."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice will lie over.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR PORTO RICO.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the bill (H. R. 9533) to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes, has been reported to the Senate and has been on the calendar for more than six months. It is a very important bill. I do not want to disturb conditions, but I wish to see if I can get unanimous consent that it be made the special order for, say, one week from to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall have to make the same objection I did on yesterday, that we can not give unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which is not before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Special orders are made, and it seems to me if they can be made surely it can be done by unanimous consent. Of course, if there is an objection, I recognize that no such order can be made; but I am not asking that a vote be taken upon that day, which would require, of course, that a quorum call be made. I am simply asking that one week from to-day the Porto Rican civil government bill be made the special order of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In order to save time, I will state that I shall have to object to that. We have a regular order before the Senate, and I shall object until that has been disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Surely it will be disposed of by next Thursday, a week from to-day, will it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senate will permit the regular order to be disposed of by that time I shall not object to the Senator's request, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to suggest that the notice which I gave day before yesterday of a motion to amend the standing rules will be in order this morning, I suppose; but in view of what occurred yesterday, I ask that the resolution which I now offer be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 306) as follows:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be amended as follows:

"Amend Rule XXXV so that it will read as follows:

"'On a motion to close the doors of the Senate on the discussion on any legislative business, no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes and a two-thirds vote shall be required for its adoption.'

"Amend paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVI so that it will read as follows, to wit:

"'Executive business, including nominations and treaties, shall be considered in open executive session: Provided, however, That after the Senate upon motion made and adopted passes into executive session it shall be in order to move that any particular item of such business shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and upon the motion no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes. If the motion is adopted by a two-thirds vote, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Principal Legislative Clerk, the Executive Clerk, the Minute and Journal Clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper ,and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy: Provided further, That treaties and confidential communications laid before the Senate by the President shall not be made public until the Senate enters upon their consideration and not then if it is ordered as hereinbefore provided that they shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings in secret session shall be kept secret until the Senate by resolution takes off the injunction of secrecy.'

"Strike out paragraph 3 of Rule XXXVI.

"Change present paragraph 4, making it 3, and also amend it by striking out in the second line thereof the words 'or confidential.'

"Strike out paragraph 5.

"Amend Rule XXXVII as follows, to wit:

"By striking from the fourth and fifth lines the words 'to remove the injunction of secrecy, or to consider it in open executive session.'

"Also, by striking out the ninth line on page 34 and substituting therefor the words 'if it has been or is being considered in secret session.'

"Insert after the word 'indefinitely,' in line 20, page 34, the words 'and a motion to consider it in secret session.'

"Also, by striking out paragraph 3.

"Amend Rule XXXVIII by striking out paragraph 2 thereof.

"If these amendments are made, Rules XXXV, XXXVI, XXXVII, and XXXVIII will read as follows, to wit:

"'RULE XXXV.

"'On a motion to close the doors of the Senate on the discussion of any legislative business, no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes, and a two-thirds vote shall be required for its adoption.

"'RULE XXXVI.

"'EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

"'1. When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber for the consideration of executive business, he shall have a seat on the right of the Presiding Officer. When the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Senators shall attend at the place appointed, with the necessary officers of the Senate.

"'2. Executive business, including nominations and treaties, shall be considered in open executive session: Provided, however, That after the Senate, upon motion made and adopted, passes into executive session, it shall be in order to move that any particular item of such business shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and upon the motion no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than five minutes. If the motion is adopted by a two-thirds vote, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Minute and Journal Clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy: Provided further, That treaties and confidential communications laid before the Senate by the President shall not be made public until the Senate enters upon their consideration, and not then if it is ordered as hereinbefore provided that they shall be considered and acted upon in secret, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings in secret session shall be kept secret until the Senate by resolution takes off the injunction of secrecy.

"'3. Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate and to punishment for contempt.

"'RULE XXXVII.

"'EXECUTIVE SESSION—PROCEEDINGS ON TREATIES.

"'1. When a treaty shall be laid before the Senate for ratification, it shall be read a first time, and no motion in respect to it shall be in order, except to refer it to a committee, to print it in confidence for the use of the Senate.

"'When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration; after which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles, and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with, the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, "Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?" And the amendments may be taken separately or in gross, if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed. At any stage of such proceedings the Senate may remove the injunction of secrecy from the treaty, if it has been or is being considered in secret session.

"'The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be, which shall be proposed on a subsequent day, unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate determines otherwise; at which stage no amendment shall be received, unless by unanimous consent.

"'On the final question to advise and consent to the ratification in the form agreed to the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators shall be necessary to determine it in the affirmative; but all other motions and questions upon a treaty shall be decided by a majority vote, except a motion to postpone indefinitely and a motion to consider it in secret session, which shall be decided by a vote of two-thirds.

"'2. Treaties transmitted by the President to the Senate for ratification shall be resumed on the second or any subsequent session of the same Congress at the stage in which they were left at the final adjournment of the session at which they were transmitted; but all proceedings on treaties shall terminate with the Congress, and they shall be resumed at the commencement of the next Congress as if no proceedings had previously been had thereon.

"'RULE XXXVIII.

"'EXECUTIVE SESSION—PROCEEDINGS ON NOMINATIONS.

"'1. When nominations shall be made by the President of the United States to the Senate, they shall, unless otherwise ordered, be referred to appropriate committees; and the final question on every nomination shall be, "Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?" which question shall not be put on the same day on which the nomination is received, nor on the day on which it may be reported by a committee, unless by unanimous consent.

"'2. When a nomination is confirmed or rejected, any Senator voting in the majority may move for a reconsideration on the same day on which the vote was taken, or on either of the next two days of actual executive session of the Senate; but if a notification of the confirmation or rejection of a nomination shall have been sent to the President before the expiration of the time within which a motion to reconsider may be made, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the President to return such notification to the Senate. Any motion to reconsider the vote on a nomination may be laid on the table without prejudice to the nomination, and shall be a final disposition of such motion.

"'3. Nominations confirmed or rejected by the Senate shall not be returned by the Secretary to the President until the expiration of the time limited for making a motion to reconsider the same, or while a motion to reconsider is pending, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

"'4. When the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess for more than 30 days, all motions to reconsider a vote upon a nomination which has been confirmed or rejected by the Senate, which shall be pending at the time of taking such adjournment or recess, shall fail; and the Secretary shall return all such nominations to the President as confirmed or rejected by the Senate as the case may be.

"'5. Nominations neither confirmed nor rejected during the session at which they are made shall not be acted upon at any succeeding session without being again made to the Senate by the President; and if the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess for more than 30 days, all nominations pending and not finally acted upon at the time of taking such adjournment or recess shall be returned by the Secretary to the President, and shall not again be considered unless they shall again be made to the Senate by the President.'"

Mr. NORRIS. I have just made inquiry and I understand that the resolution to which the Senator refers has not yet been printed. Will he include in his request the printing of the resolution?

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked that it be printed when I gave the notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the resolution has been printed. It will certainly be printed if referred to the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let it be printed and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. I have made further inquiry and I have been informed that the resolution of the Senator from Iowa has not been printed. All I care for is to have it in print. It ought to be printed, and I understand it has not been printed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked that it be printed in the RECORD and printed in the usual form.

Mr. NORRIS. That has not been done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Leave was granted and I supposed it had been done.

Mr. CLARK. It is here on our desks.

Mr. SMOOT. It is printed. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is printed and a copy is on my desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS (S. DOC. NO. 663).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since the passage of the 640-acre grazing homestead law the Commissioner of the General Land Office has had prepared for the use of the Senate Committee on Public Lands certain general comments and explanations. There is such a demand upon all western Senators for these general comments that it has been deemed wise to have the statement printed as a public document. I ask that it be so printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action will be taken.

REPUBLIC OF CUBA V. STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate resolution No. 300, submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], which comes over from a previous day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action will be taken.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 15913. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish uniform standards of classification for cotton; to provide for the application, enforcement, and use of such standards in transactions in interstate and foreign commerce; to prevent deception therein; and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PEACE OVERTURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] which was under consideration yesterday and postponed by unanimous consent until this morning.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 298) submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK December 22, 1916, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before continuing what I was saying yesterday when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, I wish to make a correction in the translation which I gave of the statement of the German ambassador which appeared in the Staats Zeitung on Sunday, December 24. At the beginning of the second paragraph I translated the words, "Deutschland steht bereit ihm zu folgen." The word "ihm" can be rendered either him or it, and I have been told by the correspondent of the Staats Zeitung, who took the statement, that the word "ihm" was used there in the sense of referring to the light, which in the previous sentence it was said the words of President Wilson cast upon the darkness of Europe, and was in continuance of the pleasing parallel which was drawn between the President's note and the Star of Bethlehem. I do not think that it alters the essential meaning of the statement, but having been informed of this by the correspondent I wish to make it absolutely accurate. Certainly nothing would be further from my mind than to misrepresent even in the smallest way what was said.

Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday at the hour of 2 o'clock I had been speaking of that clause in the President's note, which seems to me of very great importance, and which declares that the people of the United States "stand ready and even eager to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over," and so forth, pledging us to a general cooperation with the powers of Europe and other powers in an arrangement for the maintenance of the peace of the world. I pointed out that this declaration might cover a great many questions. I read yesterday to the Senate an article from the Louisville Courier Journal, one of the great Democratic newspapers of the country, calling attention to this same point. I desire, without reading, to print an article in a similar sense from the New York Sun.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT WILSON ATTEMPTS TO PLEDGE UNITED STATES TO REVERSAL OF TRADITIONAL FOREIGN POLICY.

NEW YORK, December 26.

The New York Sun, in a strong editorial, points out some of the serious implications of the recent "peace note" of President Wilson. The Sun says:

"Mr. Wilson may not be proposing peace; he may not be proposing mediation; he may not be interposing his hand or his head between the belligerents who are fighting this European war; he may not be suiting his acts to Germany's present desires—but the fact remains that he is not only proposing something which no President of the United States ever before proposed, but also pledging this Nation to something which no President of the United States has the right or the power to pledge.

"That something is the annihilation of the Monroe doctrine, which has governed the policy of the Republic for almost one century of the Republic's existence.

"Mr. Wilson speaks with feeling of the interests of the United States as a neutral power in relation to the war waged for European politics.

"There is no other interest of the United States of such transcendent importance as that which lies behind the traditional refusal of our Government to mix in the political affairs of the European nations and its traditional determination, so often and in so many forms declared, to permit no European interference with the destinies of the Republics of North, Central, and South America, no extension of European political influence in the Western Hemisphere.

"We are not discussing the merits of the Monroe doctrine or now examining its health to see if it is senile, moribund, fit for no further progress except a journey to the last resting place of obsolete and superseded national policies. We merely call attention to the outstanding fact that the proposal and pledge which occur in the course of President Wilson's eloquent expression of the natural hope of American civilization and humanity to see peace restored on a lasting basis would incidentally send the Monroe doctrine straight to the tomb. This is not to be dismissed as a matter of academic interest; its bearings on our international relations are those of a revolutionary change with practical consequences immeasurable. It means not only the utter abandonment of our attitude of aloofness from the complications of European politics, but also the absolute surrender of the position which we have maintained against all comers with regard to the American Republics south of our border. The participation of the United States in European guaranties inevitably means the entering of the European powers into the affairs of the Western Hemisphere wherein we have assumed and exercised an exclusive function. Specifically, it means European cooperation and tutelage in the affairs of Mexico, of Guatemala, of Honduras, of Nicaragua, of San Domingo, of Costa Rica, of Panama, of Colombia, of Venezuela, and so on, down to the jumping-off place of Pan American policy at Cape Horn. There is no avoiding the fact that the United States can not abolish one-half of the Monroe doctrine and preserve intact the other half.

"Here is President Wilson's proposal and his pledge:

"'In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interests, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or Government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.'

"In this passage, as the World justly remarks, 'the President pledges the cooperation of the United States in the enforcement of future guaranties of the peace of the world and the integrity of the small and weak nations of Europe. It can not be made too clear that whether this is or is not a desirable departure from past policy, it is a departure involving not only our participation in the control of the destinies of Belgium and Serbia and Roumania but also participation of Great Britain and Germany and Russia and France and Italy in the control of the destinies of Mexico, of the Central American States, of Venezuela; why not even of Cuba?

"For—the Monroe doctrine thus blithely swept away in the exuberance of emotional rhetoric is beyond the power of President Wilson to annul. The Government of the United States, by the joint action of Executive and legislature, has officially declared the Monroe doctrine to be its policy. Our participation in the peace conferences at The Hague, and our assent to the conventions there framed, were distinctly qualified and limited by this declaration:

"'Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not entering upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions or internal administration of any foreign State, nor shall anything contained in the said convention be so construed as to require the relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude, toward purely American questions.'

"As the American historian of the first peace conference at The Hague, himself one of the American delegates, well said: 'Not even in the supposed interest of universal peace would the American people have sanctioned for one moment an abandonment or the slightest infraction of a policy which appeals to them as being founded not only upon legitimate national desires and requirements but upon the highest interests of peace and progress throughout the world.' And the general conventions both of the first conference at The Hague in 1900 and of the second in 1907 were ratified by the Senate of the United States with this broad and significant reservation specifically recorded as part of the contract.

"President Wilson can, if he sees fit, propose the relinquishment of the Monroe doctrine as the traditional policy of the United States by negotiating with European countries new treaties affecting the entry of this Government into political entanglements of European concern and conversely admitting European powers into political engagements of purely American concern. The Senate of the United States can, if it chooses, validate such proposed treaties by the constitutional process of ratification.

"But until that has been done the Monroe doctrine stands as our declared policy in international relations, and there is no more power in the White House to extinguish it, or to pledge the people and the Government of the United States to the guaranty of European boundaries, than there is in this newspaper or in the executive offices of the Pennsylvania Railroad."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I present these articles simply as showing what outside judges who have given attention to this point regard as involved in this committal by this note of the administration, and of the United States by implication, to the doctrine of general cooperation with the powers of Europe. I do not wish to enter into further details, which might be extended indefinitely, because I think it must be apparent to every one that when we abandon our traditional policy of separation from the politics and affairs of Europe we take a very momentous step, and one which should not be taken without the most thorough knowledge of what is intended and of the distance to which we are to be invited to go. An approval of the note in this general form carries approval, of course, and without limitation, of the principle of general cooperation with European powers in the affairs not only of Europe but of America.

Mr. President, I desire next to call attention to the note of the German Government in reply to the President's note. I have no official copy of this note and am obliged, of course, to take that which was published in the newspapers. What I shall quote I cut from the New York Times, and I have no doubt that it is absolutely correct. The note says:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 27, 1916.]

BERLIN, December 26.

The answer of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey to President Wilson's peace note says:

"The high-minded suggestion made by the President of the United States of America to create a basis for the establishment of a lasting peace has been received and considered by the Imperial Government in the friendly spirit which was expressed in the President's communication. The President points out that which he has at heart and leaves open the choice of road.

"To the Imperial Government an immediate exchange of views seems to be the most appropriate road in order to reach the desired result. It begs, therefore, in the sense of the declaration made on December 12, which offered a hand for peace negotiations, to propose an immediate meeting of delegates of the belligerent States at a neutral place.

"The Imperial Government is also of the opinion that the great work of preventing future wars can be begun only after the end of the present struggle of the nations. It will, when this moment shall have come, be ready with pleasure to collaborate entirely with the United States in this exalted task."

The answer of the central powers concludes with the usual diplomatic terms of politeness. The text of the answer was transmitted to-day to James W. Gerard, the American ambassador.

There is nothing said in this note which corresponds to the statement of the ambassador about the "Star of Bethlehem" and the light cast by the President's word; but if we remove the very appropriate diplomatic civilities we find that on the three essential points of the President's note—which were a request for the naming of the terms, the proposal of neutral cooperation, and also a declaration as to future cooperation in a league for the preservation of the world's peace—the German note is very explicit, almost blunt. It says nothing whatever about terms; it passes that by in complete silence. It then says, according to this dispatch, that the delegates of the belligerent States should meet in a neutral place. That excludes neutrals from the conference. My own belief is that the people who are fighting the war should make the peace, and that seems to be the German view.

The German note then further says that the question of cooperation and association for the preservation of peace in the future must be relegated to the future and can not be dealt with until after the conclusion of the peace which shall bring this war to an end. I think on that point the Imperial Government takes the sensible ground which might have been anticipated.

As to the terms, we are told in this morning's newspapers that it is believed that the terms of the central powers came through Ambassador Gerard from Berlin. They also quote a statement attributed to Count Andrassy, former prime minister of Hungary, in a New Year's speech. He is quoted as saying:

As the entente alleges that our peace proposal was only a maneuver and was not made with any earnest desire to bring about peace, I am able to declare that President Wilson now knows our peace conditions and the entente can learn them from that source.

ANOTHER VERSION OF SPEECH.

The version of the Budapest dispatch received by the Reuter Telegram Co. via Amsterdam quotes Count Andrassy as saying that the peace conditions of the central powers will be communicated to President Wilson, the quotation being as follows:

"If the entente reject our peace offer only because they maintain that our offer is not honestly meant, but is merely a maneuver, and that they can not enter into negotiations before knowing our conditions, they can learn these from President Wilson, to whom they will be communicated."

Mr. President, how much truth there may be in that report I do not know. Although nothing is said about terms in the German note, it is very possible that they may have been communicated through some other channel to the President. It is the President's undoubted right in pursuing a negotiation of this or any other kind, to receive communications of that character and to exercise an absolute discretion in keeping them entirely secret; the Senate is not a part of the negotiating power, and we have no right to inquire about or to thrust ourselves into negotiations; but, Mr. President, when we are called upon to indorse and to approve an entire note which covers this question, then when we are invited to take action we should have the information on which to act.

The Senate, in my judgment, has no right—and I have thought so for a long time—to try to force itself into the conduct of a diplomatic negotiation, and when it asks for diplomatic papers its request is always accompanied with the statement that the papers be sent "if not incompatible with the public interest"; in other words, it is recognized that the whole conduct of the negotiation is in the President's hands. Now, if the President has in his possession the terms proposed by the central powers, it is entirely within his discretion to deal with them; but, if we are summoned to indorse in the dark everything that he is doing, then before action we are entitled to know the grounds of the action; in other words, when our cooperation is invited we are entitled to have the same information as that which the President has.

I wish in this connection, having read the German note and pointed out that it stated no terms; that it excludes by its words the presence of neutrals from the conference which is to make the peace, and that it puts over all propositions for the formation of a league or association for the preservation of peace to a period after the war is concluded, and the peace which brings the war to an end is made——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the able Senator allow me to suggest that his voice does not reach to this side of the Chamber and that it is almost impossible to hear anything but an occasional word of the Senator. If it does not oppress him to speak a little louder, I myself would greatly appreciate it, and I know others would be very much edified.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will endeavor to speak more plainly. I was proceeding to say, Mr. President, that having read the German note addressed to this country, I will ask to print, without reading, the German reply to the Swiss note, which covers substantially the same ground and which repeats the note addressed to the President of the United States, confining the peace conference to the belligerents, putting over all discussions of the peace of the world to a future time, and saying nothing about terms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the paper referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The paper referred to is as follows:

GERMAN REPLY TO SWISS NOTE.

[Washington Post, Dec. 29, 1916.]

BERLIN, December 27.

The German reply to the Swiss note was handed to the Swiss minister to-day. It is on the same lines as the reply to President Wilson. The text of the answer of Germany to the Swiss note reads:

"The Imperial Government has taken note of the fact that the Swiss federal council, as the result of its having placed itself in communication with the President of the United States, is also ready to take action and side with the United States toward bringing about an understanding between the belligerent nations and toward the attainment of a lasting peace.

RENEWS COFERENCE OFFER.

"The spirit of true humanity whereby the steps of the Swiss federal council are inspired is fully appreciated and esteemed by the Imperial Government.

"The Imperial Government has informed the President of the United States that a direct exchange of views seems to it to be the most suitable means of obtaining the desired result.

"Led by the same considerations which caused Germany on December 12 to offer her hand for peace negotiations, the Government has proposed an immediate meeting of all the belligerents at a neutral place.

AGREES WITH MR. WILSON.

"In agreement with the President of the United States, the Government is of the opinion that the great work of preventing future wars can only be taken in hand after the present world war has terminated. So soon as that moment comes they will joyfully be ready to cooperate in this sublime task.

"If Switzerland, which, faithful to its noble traditions, in mitigating the sufferings caused by the present war has won unending gratitude, will also contribute to safeguarding the world's peace, the German Nation and Government will highly welcome such action."

Mr. LODGE. I ought also to call attention, I think, to the fact that some of the neutral powers addressed replies to us in regard to the President's note. I regret that we have not official copies of those notes and that I am compelled to use what I cut from the newspapers, but that is the only method which we have of getting them. There was a note from Greece, which was in sympathy with the note of the President, and which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, together with a message from the King of Sweden and a portion of the Swedish note. I believe there was a note of similar sympathy received from Norway, which I have not got.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission to print the matter referred to is granted.

The papers referred to are as follows:

GREEK NOTE.

ATHENS, December 30.

King Constantine summoned Garrett Droppers, the American minister, to the palace this morning and communicated to him the text of the Greek reply to President Wilson's peace note. In the reply the King asserts himself with the President in willingness to do all in his power to promote peace. The note recites the sufferings of Greece at the hands of the belligerents on both sides while the nation has been endeavoring to maintain neutrality. It adds that Greece has endured greater hardships from the war than any other neutral, and desires the consummation of peace.

The text of the King's message follows:

"I wish to express, Mr. President, feelings of sincere admiration and lively sympathy for the generous initiative you have just taken with the view to ascertaining whether the moment is not propitious for a negotiable end of the bloody struggle raging on earth.

SEES HUMANITARIAN EFFORT.

"Coming from the wise statesman who, in a period so critical for humanity, is placed at the head of the great American Republic, this humanitarian effort, dictated by a spirit of high political sagacity and looking to an honorable peace for all, can not but contribute greatly toward hastening reestablishment of normal life and assuring through a stable state of international relations the evolution of humanity toward that progress wherein the United States of America always so largely shares."

Then follows a recital of the trials Greece has suffered from the war, which, on account of the censorship, it is useless to attempt to cable. The King's message ends as follows:

GREECE LONGS FOR PEACE.

"Such are the conditions in which your proposals find my country. This short and necessarily incomplete recital is not made with the purpose of criticism of the cruel blows at her sovereignty and neutrality from which Greece has been forced to suffer the effects. I have merely wished to show you, Mr. President, how much the soul of Greece at this moment longs for peace and how much it appreciates your proposals, which constitute so important a step in the course of the bloody world tragedy of which we are witnesses.

"(Signed) CONSTANTINE."

The Greek Government also will make a formal reply, which will associate Greece with the proposals of President Wilson.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING OF SWEDEN AND PORTION OF SWEDISH NOTE (JAN. 1).

The only one with a reference to peace received last night was from the King of Sweden. It follows:

"I beg you to accept my best wishes for the new year. I am happy to join your noble peace action."

This message went further than that of the Swedish Government received last week. The note from the Government expressed "deepest sympathy" with all efforts to end the war, but refrained from offering cooperation.

If President Wilson has formed any opinion on the entente note, it has not been disclosed.

Mr. LODGE. Also there was a note from Spain, which did not agree with the views of the President's note and refused to take present action. I should like to have that printed, too, as showing part of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The note referred to is as follows:

SPANISH NOTE (DEC. 31).

UNITED STATES ASKS NEUTRALS TO AID—SPAIN REFUSES TO ACT NOW.

MADRID, December 30.

The Spanish Government has sent a note in reply to President Wilson with reference to peace as follows:

"The Spanish Government has received from the ambassador of the United States the note sent by the President to the belligerent nations and another communication in which it is said that the moment is opportune for action by the Government of His Majesty in support of the attitude taken by the Government of the United States.

"The Spanish Government, in answer to the initiative of the President of the United States, knowing the various impressions produced, believes that the action in which Spain is invited to participate will be inefficacious, especially as the central empires have expressed their intention that the peace conditions shall be accorded exclusively among the belligerents.

"Nevertheless, the Spanish Government, having in consideration the noble desires of the American Government, which are worthy all peoples, is disposed to associate itself with every negotiation which has for its object the facilitating of the humanitarian work of ending the present war.

"Spain, however, will suspend all action until the time when her efforts and work in favor of peace can be more useful and efficacious than at the present time.

"Until then the Spanish Government believes that it would be opportune to declare with regard to an entente of the neutral powers for the defense of their interests; that it is disposed now, as it was at the beginning of the war, to commence negotiations which might lead to an accord capable of uniting the belligerent powers."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to have it supposed that my interpretation or analysis of the German note is confined to me or is an unreasonable interpretation to put upon it. I wish to read in this connection, as showing what others think of that note, an article from the New York World of December 27, 1916. Everybody knows that the President has no more faithful supporter than that great newspaper, and therefore it gives me a particular reason for desiring to read this article to the Senate. It is entitled "Germany evades the issue":

[From the New York World, Dec. 27, 1916.]

Germany's answer to President Wilson's note completely evades the issue.

The President requested from each of the belligerents a definite statement of the objects of the war and the terms upon which it would consider peace. Germany replies by proposing an immediate conference "of delegates of the belligerent States at a neutral place," knowing that this proposal had already been emphatically rejected by the entente Governments.

The President did not ask for a peace conference. He recognized the fact that a conference at this time was impossible, but expressed the hope that "an interchange of views would clear the way at least for conference." Germany refuses all interchange of views, and returns to the text of the note of December 12, which contained the proposal of the Teutonic powers "to enter forthwith into peace negotiations."

The British Government, through its prime minister, has already made its response to that suggestion. Mr. Lloyd George in his speech to the House of Commons declared emphatically that—

"To enter, on the invitation of Germany, proclaiming herself victorious, without any knowledge of the proposals she intends to make, into a conference, is putting our heads into a noose with the rope end in the hands of the Germans."

Yet in reply to the President's request for terms the German Government goes no further than to renew a proposal which it knows has been rejected. In renewing this proposal it formally excludes all neutral Governments from such a conference and inferentially asserts that they are not concerned with the kind of peace that the belligerents may choose to make.

President Wilson in his note of December 18 spoke as "the representative of a neutral Nation whose interests have been most seriously affected by the war and whose concern for its early conclusion arises out of a manifest necessity to determine how to safeguard those interests if the war is to continue." Germany's reply makes certain a continuance of the war. The United States most assuredly will not ask Great Britain and France to enter a peace conference beaten and blindfolded, to learn in the dark what terms of peace a Germany "conscious of victory" is prepared to impose. Nor can it ask friendly Governments to give serious consideration to a proposal which they have already formally rejected but which is renewed in the disguise of an answer to President Wilson's request for terms.

In the light of Germany's reply to the President, it is impossible to believe that there was either honesty or sincerity of purpose back of the original peace proposal. It is plain enough now that the President's action stripped off the German mask and that the whole proceeding was a game invented in Berlin for the propitiation of neutrals and for the further bedevilment of German public opinion.

Had Germany's peace overtures been made in good faith the Imperial Government would have met the President half way with a statement of terms that the allies could not have rejected out of hand, but to which they would have been compelled to give consideration. That would have opened the door to further negotiation and eventually to conference. Instead the German foreign office has abruptly closed the door and left no basis for further discussion.

So far as the United States is concerned, the hands of the clock have been turned back to December 18, and the Government at Washington is again confronted with "a manifest necessity to determine how to safeguard those interests if the war is to continue."

Mr. President, I think that article justifies me in saying that I have not construed or interpreted the German note uncharitably. To me it seems clear from the German note that no advance has been made on the points which the President brought forward. Yet we are asked, in the presence of that reply from Germany—and we do not know whether her terms may be in the hands of the President or not—to give a blanket indorsement, wholly blindly, to this entire negotiation. I am not contending in any way against the President's right to carry on the negotiations; I am not impugning his motives or his purposes; but I am resisting, and I mean to resist, the attempt to bring the Senate and the Congress of the United States into a blind approval of a negotiation of which we know nothing except what we see in the newspapers. If we are to indorse and approve any negotiation, then we are entitled to know all the facts in regard to it. We have not been given the facts, and yet we are asked to pass this general resolution in the presence of this reply from the one side of the belligerents which has answered. What the other side will say—the allies of the entente, as they are called—in reply to the President's note is not known. That reply has not yet arrived. I ventured to suggest the other day, when I asked to have this resolution go over, that it would perhaps be well to know what views the other belligerents took of the note, and what their position was going to be in regard to it; but it was thought best by the majority in control of the Senate that we should dispose of this matter at once.

As I have said, we have not received the reply of the allies to our note; but the reply of the allies to the German note is before the world. Although I assume that every Senator has read it, I should like to call their attention to the terms of that reply and ask them to consider whether, in view of what the allies said in answer to the German note, it is an apt and appropriate time for the Senate and the Congress of the United States to precipitate themselves into negotiations of which they know nothing.

The allies say:

The allied Governments of Belgium, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Montenegro, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, and Serbia, united for the defense of the liberty of their peoples and faithful to engagements taken not to lay down their arms separately, have resolved to reply collectively to the pretended propositions of peace which were addressed to them on behalf of the enemy Governments through the intermediary of the United States, Spain, Switzerland, and Holland. Before making any reply the allied powers desire particularly to protest against the two essential assertions of the note of the enemy powers that pretend to throw upon the allies responsibility for the war and proclaim the victory of the central powers.

The allied Governments can not admit an affirmation doubly inexact and which suffices to render sterile all tentative negotiation. The allied nations have sustained for 30 months a war they did everything to avoid. They have shown by their acts their attachment to peace. That attachment is as strong to-day as it was in 1914. But it is not upon the word of Germany, after the violation of its engagements, that the peace broken by her may be based.

A mere suggestion, without a statement of terms, that negotiations should be opened, is not an offer of peace. The putting forward by the Imperial Government of a sham proposal lacking all substance and precision would appear to be less an offer of peace than a war maneuver. It is founded on calculated misinterpretation of the character of the struggle in the past, the present, and the future.

As for the past, the German note takes no account of the facts, dates, and figures which establish that the war was desired, provoked, and declared by Germany and Austria-Hungary.

At The Hague conference it was a German delegate who refused all proposals for disarmament. In July, 1914, it was Austria-Hungary who, after having addressed to Serbia an unprecedented ultimatum, declared war upon her in spite of the satisfaction which had at once been accorded.

The central empires then rejected all attempts made by the entente to bring about a pacific solution of a purely local conflict. Great Britain suggested a conference, France proposed an international commission, the Emperor of Russia asked the German Emperor to go to arbitration, and Russia and Austria-Hungary came to an understanding on the eve of the conflict. But to all these efforts Germany gave neither answer nor effect.

Belgium was invaded by an empire which had guaranteed her neutrality and which had the assurance to proclaim that treaties were "scraps of paper" and that "necessity knows no law."

At the present moment these sham offers on the part of Germany rest on the "war map" of Europe alone, which represents nothing more than a superficial and passing phase of the situation and not the real strength of the belligerents. A peace concluded upon these terms would be only to the advantage of the aggressors, who, after imagining that they would reach their goal in two months, discovered after two years that they could never attain it.

As for the future, the disasters caused by the German declaration of war and the innumerable outrages committed by Germany and her allies against both belligerents and neutrals, demand penalties, reparation, and guaranties. Germany avoids mention of any of these.

In reality, these overtures made by the central powers are nothing more than a calculated attempt to influence the future course of war and to end it by imposing a German peace. The object of these overtures is to create dissension in public opinion in the allied countries. But that public opinion has, in spite of all the sacrifices endured by the allies, already given its answer with admirable firmness and has denounced the empty pretense of the declaration of the enemy powers.

They have the further object of stiffening public opinion in Germany and in the countries allied to her, one and all severely tried by their losses, worn out by economic pressure, and crushed by the supreme effort which has been imposed upon their inhabitants.

They endeavor to deceive and intimidate public opinion in neutral countries, whose inhabitants have long since made up their minds where the initial responsibilities lie and are far too enlightened to favor the designs of Germany by abandoning the defense of human freedom.

Finally, these overtures attempt to justify in advance in the eyes of the world a new series of crimes—submarine warfare, deportations, forced labor, and forced enlistment of the inhabitants against their own countries and violations of neutrality.

Fully conscious of the gravity of this moment, but equally conscious of its requirements, the allied Governments, closely united to one another and in perfect sympathy with their peoples, refuse to consider a proposal which is empty and insincere.

Once again the allies declare that no peace is possible so long as they have not secured reparation for violated rights and liberties, the recognition of the principle of nationalities, and of the free existence of small States; so long as they have not brought about a settlement calculated to end once and for all forces which have constituted a perpetual menace to the nations and to afford the only effective guaranty for the future security of the world.

In conclusion, the allied powers think it necessary to put forward the following considerations, which show the special situation of Belgium after two and a half years of war.

Then comes the statement in regard to Belgium, which I will not read, but which I will ask to have printed with the rest of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In virtue of the international treaties signed by five great European powers, of whom Germany was one, Belgium enjoyed before the war a special status, rendering her territory inviolable and placing her under the guaranty of the powers, outside all European conflicts.

She was, however, in spite of these treaties, the first to suffer the aggression of Germany. For this reason the Belgian Government thinks it necessary to define the aims which Belgium has never ceased to pursue while fighting side by side with the entente powers for right and justice.

Belgium has always scrupulously fulfilled the duties which her neutrality imposed upon her. She has taken up arms to defend her independence and her neutrality violated by Germany, and to show that she remains faithful to her international obligations.

GERMANY PLEDGED REPARATION.

On the 4th of August, 1914, in the Reichstag, the German chancellor admitted that this aggression constituted an injustice contrary to the laws of nations and pledged himself in the name of Germany to repair it. During two and a half years this injustice has been cruelly aggravated by the proceedings of the occupying forces, which have exhausted the resources of the country, ruined its industries, devastated its towns and villages, and have been responsible for innumerable massacres, executions, and imprisonments.

At this very moment, while Germany is proclaiming peace and humanity to the world, she is deporting Belgian citizens by thousands and reducing them to slavery.

Belgium before the war asked for nothing but to live in harmony with her neighbors. Her King and her Government have but one aim—the reestablishment of peace and justice. But they only desire peace which would assure to their country legitimate reparation, guaranties, and safeguards for the future.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have read this note because it is the only thing we have had which shows the position of the allies. Certainly from that note it is plain that they do not accept the German peace proposition. To venture into negotiations which neither party has asked us to begin, and to force our good offices of which neither party has indicated an acceptance, upon the belligerents, seems to me, in the presence of statements like that which I have just read, unwise.

The President, better informed than the rest of us, may have good grounds for it. I am speaking only in regard to the action of the Senate and the Congress of the United States. There is nothing in the German note nor in the allies' reply to the German note, as it seems to me, to justify the Senate and the Congress in embarking on the perilous field of negotiations between European powers, and in regard to terms which concern those powers alone.

It is well to remember, Mr. President, that it is not a desirable thing needlessly to create unfriendliness or ill feeling in the minds of the powers involved in war on either side. The United States, if her true policy is followed, will seek to maintain good terms with all. We do not surely desire to find ourselves at the end of the war, when peace comes, without a friend in the world among the other nations, and with the fact glaring them in the eyes that we have made uncounted millions out of a war which has cost them millions of lives and destroyed untold millions of property, and that we are wholly unprepared and quite defenseless. I think we should move with extreme caution before we enter, as the legislative body of the United States, upon this perilous field.

We have not had the assent of the belligerents to what we are undertaking. We have demanded, without our mediation or good offices having been accepted, that the belligerents should state their terms, which concern them alone and not us; and we have undertaken to lay out a policy for the future, after peace is concluded, which the Central Powers at least have said must go over. This resolution involves us in all these difficult and dangerous questions; and, so far as we are concerned as a nation, we are asked to give our indorsement to a plan which involves the abandonment of the policy that the country has pursued ever since the formation of the Constitution, after a few hasty debates in the Senate—a policy in which not only the Monroe doctrine is involved but many other questions of great domestic importance.

My objection to this resolution, Mr. President, is that there is no occasion whatever for it. The President is intrusted with the care of our foreign relations. Negotiations are in his hands. He is conducting them. When he needs our cooperation and assistance, he should lay before us all the facts which have guided him. But until that time comes, the Congress of the United States ought not to project itself into the field of negotiations, and thrust itself forward into the dangerous field of European politics. When we come to the further question of cooperation with other nations to take this leap in the dark, after a brief debate during the morning hour, without having the facts, without knowing what we are asked to do, seems to me the height of unwisdom on the part of the Senate or of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LEWIS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. LEWIS. May I venture the suggestion, lest I should violate the rule, not intentionally, that in the morning hour to-morrow I be permitted to be recognized as having my right to the floor the same as the able Senator from Massachusetts was this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will note the fact that the Senator will desire recognition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to make a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be announced.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 298.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator to do as he did yesterday, to ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow morning, and then be taken up in the morning hour, without prejudice, the same as it was this morning?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would be very glad to agree to that, but it has become evident that in order to pass the resolution at a time when it will be of any value at all it must come before the Senate as its business. If a unanimous consent agreement could be reached to vote upon it before 2 o'clock to-morrow I would not object, but that would require the calling of a quorum. I should like to have it considered for a short time at least as the business of the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. STONE. Would not the Senator consent, if we could have an agreement to vote on it at 5 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would also be acceptable. While I desire to hold my right in making the motion at this time for the purpose of bringing it before the Senate, I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri and make the request that the resolution be taken up during the morning hour to-morrow and continued before the Senate, and that it be finally voted on at not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator makes a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In order to save the time which calling the roll would necessitate, I give notice that I will object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, I make my motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 298, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] owing to illness and to state that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. STONE. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska is, I understand, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which was being debated at the hour of 2 o'clock and before. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a measure is not debatable, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is debatable after 2 o'clock, the Chair may say.

Mr. STONE. It is debatable now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; after 2 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. I do not care to debate it, except to say that whatever Senators may think with respect to this resolution or as to the wisdom of its introduction and consideration, the fact is that the resolution is before the Senate. It has taken a course here in debate that has given to it a significance and importance which did not attach to it when it was introduced; but now it is discussed in all the newspapers of the country, and the fact that it is pending here is cabled to newspapers abroad everywhere. So it seems to me in the circumstances, because of the world-wide interest now in this resolution, it should be considered by the Senate and disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on two occasions this resolution under our rules would have gone to the calendar, but the Senate, in its good nature and courtesy, permitted it to be passed over day by day, retaining its place. Under those circumstances it seems to me to be a matter of impropriety, to say the least, for the proponents of the resolution to now undertake to force it through the Senate to-day. There are Senators on this side of the Chamber who desire to discuss the resolution. I had thought myself that I might say a few words in reference to it, as I have felt a deep interest in the matter and still feel a deep interest in it; but there are other Senators who have views on this question and who feel that they are entitled to be heard.

For that reason, Mr. President, I trust that the effort to force the resolution to a vote to-day will be abandoned by its friends. I do not believe that it will succeed if it is attempted. As I have already suggested, those of us who are opposed to the resolution have shown a disposition not to enforce the rules against it, but to permit every possible courtesy and consideration to be accorded to it. We now feel that to attempt to force the resolution to a vote to-day would not be the kind of reciprocity that we are entitled to. I hope the motion will not prevail.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it was my intention during the pendency of this resolution to address the Senate for a short time upon it. Personally, I would be willing that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska should prevail were it not for the fact that the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] some time ago, in accordance with the custom of the Senate, gave notice that at the conclusion of the morning business he would address the Senate on a very important topic. It is a courtesy which the Senate has always extended, so far as I know, to those of its Members who have given such a notice, and the honored custom would certainly require that due consideration should be given to the Senator from California now.

Hence, in order that the resolution may not lose its place, and in view of the further fact that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] had also given notice of an intention to address the Senate at the same time and with his usual courtesy has given way to the Senator from California temporarily, I think it is no more than right that the resolution should go over to be considered to-morrow in the morning hour.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is in error in stating that I have instituted a movement to force this resolution to a vote to-day. I only ask that the consideration of it may proceed to-day. I made an offer a few minutes ago to consent that it should go over until to-morrow if I could secure unanimous consent to vote upon it by 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, which is a clear indication that I have not any desire to force it to a vote to-day.

I was not aware that the Senator from California and the Senator from Georgia had given the notices referred to, but those addresses which they expect to make must necessarily be made during the pendency of some regular business.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to suggest to the Senator, if he will yield to me, while I think that is true with reference to both the notices, so far as the notice I gave is concerned I have about abandoned my intention to address the Senate except in connection with legislation which will be before the Senate soon on the subject matter.

If the Senator will pardon me, while I am on my feet I will say that I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado. Of course we ought to give the Senator from California who wants to speak to-day full opportunity to do so, but he can speak just as well while the pending proposition is the motion of the Senator from Nebraska as on anything else, and I think that should be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in calling attention to the fact that I had given notice that I would address the Senate to-day. I have no disposition to delay action on the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska. One branch of the subject that I am expecting to discuss is connected with the very resolution now before the Senate, and I think it is a very important branch of it, namely, the functions of the different departments of the Government. So I can just as well make my address, if that is satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska, after his resolution is taken up as at any other time. I have no disposition to prevent that course being taken, though I am prepared to go on now and would be very glad if I could be allowed that courtesy at this time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator from California and the Senator from Georgia very much. I only desire to say in conclusion that the essence of time is important in this case. If this resolution is to be passed to be of any significance at all, it ought to be passed within a reasonable length of time. All I am asking is that it be placed before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I feel it my duty to press before long for a continuance of the executive session, which is now engaged in the consideration of an important nomination. I do not wish at all to interfere with the Senator from California, who has given notice of his desire to address the Senate, but I shall deem it my duty to press an executive session as soon as possible.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator from Nevada, he does not intend to make a motion to go into executive session if the motion of the Senator from Nebraska now pending prevails.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not at present.

Mr. NORRIS. If, however, that motion is defeated and we take up the unfinished business, which has been pending before the Senate for some time, and has been really before the Senate for four years, I presume he will interpose his motion to go into executive session. That all reminds me that there seems to be a disposition to go into executive session and to take up other business whenever it can interfere with the consideration of the bill which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has in charge that has been the unfinished business so long and that has already on one occasion passed the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will just wait a moment, I will be glad to yield to him when I have finished this sentence. It all indicates to me that whenever business can be taken up that will displace or postpone the consideration of the retirement bill it is done. The Senator from Nevada is willing to let the business that he deems so important and that has been crowded on the Senate displace the unfinished business; he is willing to let it go over if you can get something else up that will interfere with the pending bill. It has been before the Senate and before the country for years. The bill is not much longer than one's finger, and it ought to be disposed of. If it should be defeated, that would end it, but we ought to have a vote on it.

It does seem to me in voting on the motion to take up the resolution, we ought to take those facts into consideration. The relative importance of the resolution approving the President's action in sending notes may be of such a nature that it ought to be disposed of soon. I do not think there is any disposition to unreasonably postpone action on it, but I believe if we want to be fair we ought to dispose of the measure the Senator from Michigan has in charge and get rid of it one way or the other. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senator from Nebraska that I have no disposition whatever to interfere with or to obstruct the bill which is being urged by the Senator from Michigan. On the contrary, I strongly favor that bill myself and have regretted exceedingly that anything I have done during the course of its proceeding has delayed it. I wish to say with reference to the executive session that we all know that the Interstate Commerce Commission is an overworked commission; that it has an enormous work on hand——

Mr. NORRIS. I did not yield to the Senator to make a speech. If he has a question to propound, I will be glad to answer it; otherwise I decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not finding fault with anybody who opposes the bill of the Senator from Michigan. I concede that there are two sides to it. I am not complaining because some one objects to it and desires to vote against it. That is true of nearly all legislation. But it is a remarkable fact that a great many of those who have opposed it say, like the Senator from Nevada, that they are in favor of it, and yet they vote for motions to displace it and to put it off from time to time. The Senator from Nevada has been interposing a motion to go into executive session now for a great many days, both before and since the adjournment for the holiday recess. He may be in favor of the measure and will probably vote for it if it ever reaches a final stage, but like other Senators his vote delays a consideration of it and postpones it so that we may never reach a vote, or when we reach a vote it will be at a time of this session when it is well known by everybody that it can not be taken up and considered in the other House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator declined to permit me to continue with my explanation. I was about to state that the Interstate Commerce Commission is an overworked commission. There is a vast accumulation of work there which it is very difficult to dispose of. To-day it is without one of its commissioners. The term of office of Mr. Daniels expired some days ago. It is for that reason that I am urging action upon the confirmation of his appointment.

The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] gave notice of his desire to speak to-day. That has been a long-standing notice, and I am sure I have no disposition to interfere with him; I would be glad to have him proceed; but, later on, at as early an hour as possible, I must insist upon a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I can add little to what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has said in reference to this matter. I, too, have been impressed with the fact that Senators who have professed friendship for the Volunteer officers' bill have been those who have defeated its consideration up to date. On every occasion when I have had it before the Senate there has been some one with a proposition to present as being more urgent, and enough Senators have always been induced to vote for it to displace the Volunteer officers' bill. I do not wish to question their sincerity, but I am simply stating the fact as the RECORD will disclose.

This bill was made the unfinished business, and if it could have been held before the Senate as it could have been held if its friends had been willing, it would have been disposed of long before this.

Senators may say that there is great opposition to it. So is there opposition to every one of the propositions which have displaced it. If we could proceed with this bill as we could do if the alleged friends were willing to do so, we would have it out of the way; we could get a vote on it; and all I have asked is to let us see whether a majority of the Senate want the bill to pass or not.

Now, what do we have before us? When this bill was made the unfinished business the Senator from Nevada, who says he is a friend of the measure, presented his proposition to go into executive session to confirm a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was known that there could be no vote upon confirmation for some time. It was known that we were considering this bill and were approaching what seemed to be a determination of it when it was displaced. Every time a motion was made to go into executive session there were enough friends of the Volunteer officers' bill who voted for the motion to carry it by a small majority.

Now comes the proposition to consider this resolution. I have been very willing to have the resolution considered during the morning hour. We have consented unanimously that it should be the continuing business during every morning. In the very nature of things a vote must be had under that process if it continues, perhaps as soon as it could be had, if we should take the course now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Now, of course, if the unfinished business is to be retained we must vote down the proposition to take up this resolution, and must vote down the proposition to go into executive session and consider this bill and keep it before the Senate until it is disposed of. I do not think that is an unfair proposition. The bill was brought up when these questions were not pending and very few Senators have thus far prevented its consideration. I do not say that they have done so improperly. I occupied some time myself in discussing the bill. I want other Senators to occupy time, but they are ready to go on; they are ready to discuss it, and we could get a vote upon it in a short time if the Senate would do us the courtesy, if the friends of the bill would do us the courtesy, of allowing us to hold it as the unfinished business.

What is going to happen if the motion of the Senator from Nebraska prevails? If the Senator's motion prevails and the resolution is carried over until adjournment to-day, which it will be, it becomes the unfinished business to-morrow and the Volunteer officers bill is displaced. The friends of the bill know some of the difficulties which I have met in getting recognition to call up the bill. I have failed time and time again. I have been twice on my feet and addressed the Chair—not the present occupant of the chair—when there was no other Senator on the floor, and yet I could not secure recognition. It is now before the Senate as the unfinished business, and I ask that it be held there at least until a reasonable opportunity be given to see whether we can get a vote upon it or not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan whether he has asked unanimous consent for a time to vote upon the bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have repeatedly, and I should like to ask it again now. I should like to get consent to vote upon it some day next week.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it seems to me it ought to be granted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, it does seem so to me. If the Senator believes that that can be done, I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I believe, with the Senator, that there are enough votes here to pass the bill, and it ought to be passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I know that very well. That is the remarkable thing, I will say to the Senator from Nevada, that for years we have had votes enough to pass this bill, but we could not bring it to a vote, not alone because it was talked to death—for it was not—but because even friends of the bill would vote to bring in some other measure and thereby take enough votes from the friends of the Volunteer officers bill to defeat its consideration to final completion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (to Mr. TOWNSEND). Ask unanimous consent now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, Mr. President, if it is in order, I will ask unanimous consent now——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to take up Senate resolution 298.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. LANE. Am I in order to make a few remarks on the resolution at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has been recognized.

Mr. LANE. Well, could I get a moment's time from the Senator from California?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident to my mind that the time of the Senate this afternoon is going to be taken up with the debate which is now on. It is probably just as good a time now as any other for me to say what I desire to say under the notice that I have given to the Senate. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has had the floor in the discussion of the resolution which has been pending, but, as I understand, he reserved the right to conclude what he had to say to-morrow morning. Therefore, as there is a debatable question now before the Senate, I shall proceed to discuss the question as I have desired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, let me make clear this: If the vote of the Senate shall be that the resolution shall remain the subject of the discussion, then I shall conclude what I have to say, I hope, in a few words; but if it shall not be and the resolution shall remain morning business, the Senator from California is correct, and I shall ask to be recognized only in the morning hour, as I would not assume, under the general order of business, to continue this discussion and to take advantage of other Senators.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion upon the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], but with a profound sense of regret that the resolution should have been debated in the Senate of the United States at all. The offer of our good offices to the belligerent nations is purely an executive function

I have in this body criticized more than once the encroachment of the executive department upon the legislative functions of Congress, and I think it is just as much out of place for the Congress of the United States to attempt to interfere with or encroach upon the rights and obligations of the President of the United States in the performance of his duty. It is mainly for that reason, Mr. President, that I have felt that the Congress of the United States ought not to take any action at all upon the resolution. If the President is right in the step he has taken, he needs no indorsement by the Congress of the United States. If, on the other hand, he is wrong, then he should not receive such indorsement. I expect in what I am about to say to discuss the question at some little length of the duties and obligations of the different departments of the Government and the attempts by one to encroach upon the other.

Mr. WORKS thereupon addressed the Senate, pursuant to the notice heretofore given. After having spoken for some time, he said:

Mr. President, for physical reasons I shall not be able to conclude to-night what I was going to say. It is suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that a recess might be taken until to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly indicate about what time it will require for him to complete his remarks?

Mr. WORKS. I think it will be less than an hour. I have consumed more than half the time that I shall need.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator desires the matter to go over with that statement, I am sure I have no objection.

Mr. WORKS. I shall be very glad if that can be done.

RECESS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in view of the Senator's statement, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The motion is for a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is agreeable to me.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 5, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 4, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With true devotion in our hearts, Eternal God our Heavenly Father, we would prostrate ourselves before Thee and worship Thee in spirit and in truth; that we may be strengthened, exalted, purified, and thus fitted for the duties which wait upon us, and reap the fruits of righteousness as servants of the Living God, after the manner of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM NIAGARA RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution. It is unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 186) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the bill has been adopted, and I ask for a vote on it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the privilege of offering an amendment also.

Mr. RAINEY. I would also like to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield the floor, or just yield it for an amendment?

Mr. FLOOD. I just yield it for the purpose of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In granting any permit under the provisions of this joint resolution the Secretary of War shall require any person or corporation to which such permit may be granted to enter into an agreement to pay to the United States compensation at the rate of $100 per annum for each foot of water so daily diverted under the permit granted during any time during which such diversion shall continue after the time herein named for the termination of such permit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a word in explanation of the amendment. The joint resolution provides that all permits shall terminate under the amendment of the House on the 4th of March, and under the original resolution, I believe, on the 1st of July. My amendment simply provides that these parties receiving the permits shall enter into an agreement to pay compensation after the date of the expiration of the permit if they continue to use the water.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask this question of my colleague. By the adoption of this amendment would that not extend the grant to these companies perpetually?

Mr. MANN. It would not. The resolution expressly provides that permits shall terminate at a fixed date. But supposing they continue to use the water, who is going to stop it? How is it going to be stopped? They have been using the water for years without permit.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to say——

Mr. MANN. Now, the amendment simply provides that they shall agree to pay for the use of the water after the permit is revoked, if it is continued in use.

Mr. FLOOD. Pay how much?

Mr. MANN. One hundred dollars for each cubic foot per annum.

Mr. FLOOD. I have no objection to that amendment. I think it is a very good one.

Mr. MANN. They do not get any further rights.

Mr. SABATH. They would not get any further rights under this? Do they claim any other rights under that?

Mr. MANN. They will claim rights undoubtedly, in any event.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. RAINEY. To make some inquiries of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. How much time does the gentleman want? I have 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. RAINEY. I just want to ask a question.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield a minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. What compensation will the Government receive under this amendment?

Mr. MANN. I hope it will not receive any, but it provides for $100 per annum for each cubic foot of water after the expiration of the permits.

Mr. RAINEY. One hundred dollars for each cubic foot?

Mr. FLOOD. Which will be about $5 per horsepower if they generate as much power as they ought to generate.

Mr. RAINEY. Will that operate continually in force?

Mr. MANN. It would not. The resolution expressly provides the permits shall cease. It is in the nature of a penalty. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield a minute to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I am in sympathy, I will say, with the amendment. The idea really is to make the rate so high it will be prohibitive.

Mr. MANN. It is a penalty——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman does not desire by setting this price that that shall be a standard of compensation?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. KEATING. On that point of the rate being prohibitive, as a matter of fact, I do not think it would be prohibitive.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that it is prohibitive, but it is in the nature of a penalty.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman want to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to present an amendment; yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is it a separate amendment, or an amendment to this amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. It is an amendment to this amendment. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the propriety of putting in the word "cubic" before the word "foot" and the word "second" after the word "foot," so as to avoid any misunderstanding of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think likely that ought to be done.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, those amendments will be made, inserting the word "cubic" and the word "second."

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Virginia will yield a moment further, I wish to say the amendment provides that the compensation shall be at the rate of $100 per annum for each cubic foot per second diverted daily. The meaning of that language is not entirely clear to me. Possibly I ought to understand it. But is it the thought of the gentleman from Illinois that this shall be a daily charge for each cubic foot of water that is diverted?

Mr. MANN. At the rate of $100 per annum for each cubic foot of water diverted.

Mr. MONDELL. But the word "daily"——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Wyoming offering an amendment, or just talking about it?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming is desirous of having an understanding of what the amendment means.

Mr. MANN. The resolution provides for a daily diversion of the water. I used the language of the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman submit to a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. FLOOD. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes left.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Is his amendment sufficiently specific? In the event the cubic-foot rate was only operative a portion of the year, or a month in the year, would it still authorize the charge?

Mr. MANN. At the rate of $100 per annum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Suppose you only ran it a week?

Mr. MANN. Then you would charge for that time at the rate of $100 per annum. It requires them under the agreement to pay it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If they ran it only a week in the year, they ought not to be charged as much as if they ran it a year. Is it a pro rata charge, or have they to run it 365 days a year?

Mr. MANN. A pro rata charge if they run it a day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If they would only run it a day it would be a nuisance. I do not think it is sufficiently clear.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, suppose a foot of water is used a great many times in going down that declivity, as it could be. But the plants are not so equipped, I understand, as to use it very many times. But a cubic foot of water might easily be used a dozen times in going down that declivity. No matter how many times it is used the companies would still pay the amount mentioned in the gentleman's amendment and no more?

Mr. MANN. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this penalty applies to the additional water or to all the water diverted?

Mr. MANN. It only applies to the water granted under permit in this resolution.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Is it a penalty?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Then I have no objection to that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this suggestion: If the intent of the amendment is to make a charge of a hundred dollars per cubic foot of water diverted per annum, then the charge is not great enough to make the use of the water prohibitive. As a matter of fact it is a very low charge.

Mr. FLOOD. I agree with the gentleman that it is a reasonable charge.

Mr. MONDELL. If, however, it is a daily charge of $100 per cubic foot per second, then, of course, it is entirely prohibitive.

Mr. FLOOD. It is not a daily charge; it is a per annum charge.

Mr. MONDELL. Then why is the word "daily" used?

Mr. MANN. The word "daily" is used because the provision of the resolution is, "That in no event shall the total quantity of water diverted from said river above the Falls for power purposes exceed in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second."

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will say to my friend that the language used there is intended to prevent a diversion of more than 20,000 cubic feet per second at any time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has the floor and the control of the time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will yield to the gentleman one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be added to this bill some such proviso as this: "Provided, That the rate charged by any permittee for the use of the power shall be just and reasonable."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution runs only to the 4th of March. There would not be opportunity for any of the officials to determine what would be a reasonable charge within that time. We will have a bill coming here in a few days to regulate that matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I simply want to put on record the statement as a matter of principle that the Federal Government has the right to put that condition in any grant it makes, and that it ought to be in this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Commission in the State of New York regulates the charge that these people will have to pay.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know; but the gentleman from New York claims that the Public Service Commission of New York State is the only authority that ought to be permitted to regulate rates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. And I think the State of New York ought to get this revenue.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the Federal Government ought to regulate all such rates.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] offers a substitute. Then, I will call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. KEATING:

"Provided, That permittees under this resolution shall pay into the Treasury of the United States $1 per horsepower year for all power developed by water diverted from the Niagara River: Provided further, That the permittees shall dispose of the power thus generated at reasonable rates and without discrimination to such individuals and corporations as may apply for the same: Provided further, That a board to be known as the Niagara water-power board, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby created and authorized to formulate and enforce such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this resolution, as may be necessary to carry into effect the foregoing provisions, and said board is further authorized, in case of controversy between any permittee under this resolution and any user or users of power generated by water diverted from Niagara River, to determine what would be a reasonable rate for the use of said power; and the finding of such board shall be binding on said permittee."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not a substitute for the amendment which I offered. It relates to an entirely different matter.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the Mann amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment again reported, as some Members were not in at the time it was offered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit. I move to recommit the Senate joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That permittees under this resolution shall pay into the Treasury of the United States $1 per horsepower year for all power developed by water diverted from the Niagara River; permittees shall dispose of the power thus generated at reasonable rates and without discrimination to such individuals and corporations as may apply for the same: Provided further, That a board to be known as the Niagara water-power board, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby created and authorized to formulate and enforce such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this resolution, as may be necessary to carry into effect the foregoing provisions, and said board is further authorized, in case of controversy between any permittee under this resolution and any user or users of power generated by water diverted from Niagara River, to determine what would be a reasonable rate for the use of said power; and the finding of such board shall be binding on said permittee.

Mr. FLOOD. And on that motion to recommit, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to recommit that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Because it deals with a different matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because it provides that there shall be a charge for water diverted under other authority than that conferred by this bill.

Mr. KEATING. Not at all; there is no such provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion of the gentleman from Colorado provides that there shall be a charge of $1 per horsepower for all water diverted from the Niagara River. This bill is to confer upon persons now taking water from Niagara River, under permits of the War Department, authority to take additional water. The proposed motion not only seeks to impose a tax upon the additional water granted by the joint resolution, but to impose a tax for water being taken under authority previously granted. There can be no other construction given to the language, because it refers to "all water," and it is a matter of information to be gathered from the reading of the joint resolution itself that water is now being diverted by persons to whom the permits will be issued other than that authorized to be taken under the terms of the pending resolution.

It is not germane to impose a tax for taking water under some other act as an amendment to a bill authorizing a tax for the taking of water in addition to what is being taken.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, there is no other act authorizing the diversion of water from Niagara River. There was such an act, but that act has expired. There is now no law permitting anyone to divert water from Niagara River. These permits, if issued by the Secretary of War, will authorize the diversion of 20,000 cubic feet of water. The Secretary of War should not recognize the right of power companies now operating at Niagara Falls to divert a single foot of water except under these permits.

If the legislation now pending before the House is designed to make legal an illegal diversion of water now taking place, the country should know that that is the object of the legislation. I feel that my motion is in order. The purpose of the motion, I will state frankly, is to enable the Government of the United States to collect what is a reasonable charge for the diversion of this water; further than that, to see that the rates charged by the power companies are reasonable, and that discrimination is not practiced by the power companies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado will not deny that there is other water being diverted than that proposed to be granted under this resolution. That water is being diverted by companies possessing certain riparian rights and under certain grants from the State of New York and under permits issued by the Federal Government, although the time has expired under which the permits from the Federal Government were granted. Under a decision of the United States Supreme Court, there is no power to prevent the continuance of the diversion except by Congress itself. There is water being diverted other than the water to be diverted under the provisions of this act, and this motion to recommit purports to impose a tax for the diversion of the water taken not under the authority contained in this joint resolution. That proposition is not germane to the resolution. All that could be done in this resolution would be to impose a tax for the taking of the water, in accordance with its provisions, and that has already been done in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which has been adopted; and this amendment is not germane to the joint resolution.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. BENNET. On the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Which side is the gentleman on?

Mr. BENNET. On the same side as my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Supplementing what my colleague has said, the 15,600 cubic feet now being taken are being taken legally, because they are being taken by authority of a statute of the State of New York, and under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, where Congress has the power—assuming that it has the power in this case—and does not exercise it, any State can exercise the same power until it is superseded by congressional action. That was held in the matter of naturalization, as to which Congress had the power to pass a uniform naturalization law, but refrained from exercising it until 1906. In the meantime——

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAINEY. To address an inquiry to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. Is the gentleman familiar with the recent case involving the franchise granted by the State of New York to the Development Co., a subcompany of the Aluminum Co. of America, which attempted to develop power at the Long Sault Rapids in the St. Lawrence River, in which case, as I remember it, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the State of New York had no right to grant that authority?

Mr. BENNET. I do not think that was the holding. I know the gentleman referred to that when this matter was before the House on a previous occasion; but I am informed—although I am frank to say I have not looked up the decision—that the holding does not fully bear out the gentleman's contention. I know what the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States was in the naturalization case, where the arguments were on all fours with the question before the House. The holding in that case was that where the Constitution granted to Congress the power to pass exclusive legislation, until Congress did pass that exclusive legislation the State could pass legislation to take care of existing situations. That is what the State of New York has done in relation to this water power, and the 15,600 cubic feet that are now being taken are being taken by authority of law. Therefore the contention of my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] is correct, that the motion of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] covers water which is now being taken legally from Niagara.

Mr. STAFFORD. In that connection will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the Burton law, as I read it, the permittee was limited to 15,600 cubic feet per second.

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under this resolution he is authorized to divert more than 15,600 cubic feet. He is authorized to divert more than 20,000 cubic feet per second, provided the aggregate for 24 hours does not exceed that amount. The Burton law limited the amount specifically not to exceed 15,600 cubic feet per second; but we all know that in the use of water power they can utilize more during the load period during the day than during the night, and this resolution would permit the Secretary of War to authorize them to use not to exceed 20,000 cubic feet per second, provided it did not amount to a daily aggregate in excess of that. During the daytime they could divert 80,000 feet, 100,000 feet, or perhaps 200,000 cubic feet per second, provided in the aggregate it did not exceed 20,000 feet for a day of 24 hours.

Mr. BENNET. That has nothing to do with the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that he does not want any discussion of the merits of the motion, but what he wants is a discussion of the point of order. Is this motion of the gentleman from Colorado in order or not? That is the question.

Mr. BENNET. The contention of my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] and myself, of course, is that the motion is not in order, because the 15,600 cubic feet per second now being taken is being taken by authority of law; and as I caught the reading of the motion of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] he attempts to impose a very large charge, not only on the 4,400 cubic feet per second but on the 15,600 cubic feet per second being taken under authority of an act of the Legislature of the State of New York. Therefore the motion is not germane.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and the other gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] are mistaken in their view as to the law governing this matter. The Niagara River is not only a navigable stream but it is also a stream marking the boundary between the United States and a foreign nation. The United States and the other nation entered into a treaty by the terms of which Canada could divert 36,000 cubic feet and the United States of America 20,000 cubic feet of the water of this navigable boundary stream. Both of the gentleman from New York say that 15,600 feet of the water now being diverted on the American side of the river is diverted under authority of a statute of the State of New York. In this they are, in my judgment, entirely mistaken. The Congress of the United States some years ago passed what is called the Burton law, permitting the diversion on the American side of 15,600 cubic feet and no more. It was the United States Government which gave this permission by the Burton law enacted in accordance with the terms of the treaty. Now, the Constitution makes a treaty, and any law of Congress duly enacted to carry out its provisions, the supreme law of the land. Therefore it is not a statute of the State of New York which grants or refuses permission to these persons to divert this water.

The treaty and law make the Secretary of War of the United States the executive officer to enforce the provisions of the law in so far as these concern the division on this side of the boundary.

As I said, the Congress passed a law under which certain persons were granted permission for a definite term to use 15,600 feet. That term expired. An extension was granted, and that also expired some time ago. Last summer the permittees went to the Secretary of War and asked his permission to divert water up to the total of 20,000 cubic feet possible to be lawfully diverted under the provisions of the treaty, and he granted that permission. But recently the Secretary came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which reported the pending resolution, and admitted that after granting this permission he had investigated the law and ascertained that as the time limit fixed by Congress had expired he had no authority to grant the permit. As a matter of fact, all the water now being diverted is diverted wholly without authority of law.

If the diverting of 15,600 feet per second is under a law of the State of New York, why did not the permittees ask the Legislature of the State of New York to grant them permission to use the additional 4,400 feet, the balance of the 20,000 feet permissible to be diverted on the American side under the treaty? Why were they here asking the Secretary of War to grant it? He made a mistake. He is wholly without authority. He admitted it. But the passage of this resolution is necessary not only to enable him to grant them permission to divert the additional water which they asked for, but it is necessary also before he can lawfully permit them to divert any water at all. In other words, they are wholly without the right now to divert any of the 20,000 feet.

It seems to me that the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York against the motion to recommit is not well taken.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. To discuss this point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I contend that if this Congress has any jurisdiction over that stream at all, the proposition of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is entirely germane. I am not willing to submit to the doctrine that the State of New York can set a lot of corporations out on an international stream and forbid the United States Congress assuming jurisdiction over the water they are taking out of that stream. The contention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is shrewd and sharp when he says that whenever the United States fails to assume jurisdiction the State has a perfect right to exercise its own jurisdiction. Then if he and a lot of others can keep the United States from exercising its jurisdiction, that set of corporation cannibals will be left there to cravenly devour the substance of humanity for the next generation as they have in the past.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is not going to undertake to determine this squabble between the United States Government and the State of New York as to who controls the waters of the Niagara River. The title of the resolution before the House shows whether this is germane or not. It is a joint resolution "authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River," and entirely through these proceedings it has been assumed that the 15,600 cubic feet now being diverted from the river are being diverted lawfully. This resolution has simply to do with the additional grant of water up to 20,000 cubic feet, and the point of order is sustained. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-eight gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. The gentleman from Colorado temporarily withdraws the point of order. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two gentlemen in the negative. Twenty-eight is not a sufficient number.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN (during the count). Mr. Speaker, may I submit a parliamentary inquiry a little out of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the House having taken a vote upon the passage of a resolution and then having taken a vote on whether they would order the yeas and nays, and having refused to order the yeas and nays, if no quorum is now announced, is the resolution passed, or would there be an automatic call of the House upon the passage of the resolution? I was under the impression that the matter was disposed of when the yeas and nays were refused and the resolution was passed. I am not sure about that.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KEATING. I merely want to make the statement to the Speaker that my object in making the point of no quorum was to get a record vote upon the resolution. I endeavored to get that record vote by calling for the yeas and nays, and failing in that I made the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had made the point of no quorum first, he would have obtained his automatic call. Mr. Speaker, I think he slept upon his rights.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I submit that my actions followed naturally, whether in accordance with the precedents or not. I wanted a record vote. The thing for me to do was to demand the yeas and nays. The count of the Speaker having developed the fact that there was not a quorum in the House, I then had the right to make the point of no quorum. I am not familiar with the precedents, but I submit to the Speaker that as a matter of common sense I am now entitled to a record vote upon this question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is in error. The Speaker announced the vote upon the passage of the resolution. The presumption is that a quorum is always present. That is the presumption under which the House transacts all of its business. If the gentleman did not believe that a quorum was present and desired to have a record vote, the raising of the question of the absence of a quorum would have automatically given him a roll call, because the House was dividing. He did not raise the question that a quorum was absent, and therefore the presumption that a quorum was present prevails. He demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused, and then he made the point of order that there was no quorum present; but that relates to the time of the business on his demand for the yeas and nays and does not relate back to the prior transaction when the vote was being taken upon the passage of the resolution. The presumption is that a quorum was present, and the question was not raised when the vote was announced.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman from New York if there is any other presumption than this where the record shows less than a quorum. That is, the Speaker announces the ayes and noes, and in the aggregate there is less than a quorum, but nothing is said about it by anyone on the floor, the point of no quorum not being made; then the presumption would be that a quorum was present.

But if immediately upon the fact being announced that there were 50 ayes and 50 noes, say, and a man then raises the point that there was no quorum, then there is no presumption anywhere, and ought not to be, because immediately upon the fact being announced by the Speaker that there are only 50 ayes and 50 noes, 100 in the aggregate, being present, that was the first means the gentleman from Colorado had to know how many there were in the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow the Chair on that particular point, the question of whether he would order the yeas and nays by asking the gentleman to stand up is not at all conclusive as to whether there is a quorum in the House or not. A great many of them sit in their seats and do not care a straw whether they have a roll call or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman overlooks the rule of the House by which the House automatically votes upon a question. If, when the House is dividing, the question of the absence of a quorum is raised and it is ascertained that a quorum is not present, the roll is automatically called, and the question is taken upon the pending question. The question was taken upon the passage of the bill. No question of the absence of a quorum was raised. The gentleman then demanded the yeas and nays. The House refused to order the yeas and nays. It requires one-fifth of those present to order the yeas and nays, and having refused to order them the vote upon the bill stands as announced by the Speaker. The gentleman now raises the question that there is not a quorum present. The only way a quorum can be brought to the House, if the Speaker finds upon count that there is not a quorum present, is by a call of the House. It requires a motion to call the House, because the House is not dividing upon any question when the point of no quorum is raised. That has been the uniform, unbroken practice of the House. It would be as appropriate for the Speaker to decide that because there is no quorum present now that there was no quorum present when the Journal was approved. The question of the presence of a quorum must be raised at the time the business is transacted, and having passed beyond the time when the vote is taken and the vote announced, we pass on to the question of whether the House will or will not order the yeas and nays upon the vote. The House having refused, if the gentleman desires to bring a quorum, if there be none present, it will require a motion for a call of the House to bring it. Under the rule providing for an automatic roll call we have passed beyond the stage where that can be had.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, may I refresh the Speaker's memory concerning one point which may or may not have a bearing upon this question? The Speaker will recall that after I called for the yeas and nays and he had counted those who requested the yeas and nays, I made the point of no quorum before the other side was counted, and the Speaker said that the point of order "would be temporarily withdrawn."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado states the sequence of facts as they are, and it seems to me he may have been misled as to the rights he had in the premises, and, under the circumstances of the case, the Chair thinks that it is his duty to count the House and announce the result. There are 206 Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. KEATING. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule there is no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether there is an automatic call.

The SPEAKER. I think not, under the circumstances of this peculiar case. The trouble is that the gentleman from Colorado raised this point in due time, and at the suggestion of the Chair withheld it, and therefore the Chair thinks we ought to have an automatic call.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] for any reason waived his rights, even at the suggestion of the Chair, the Chair can not waive my rights as a Member of the House, and can not make a ruling that the gentleman is entitled to something he surrendered at the suggestion from the Chair. I insist there is no automatic call of the House under the rule, and the only call can be a call on the motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. It was the fault of the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has acquiesced in it, and the Chair can not make a bad ruling to help him out of his hole.

The SPEAKER. There do not seem to be any precedents concerning it. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. By holding that the gentleman from Colorado is entitled to his automatic call, then the motion of the gentleman from New York in that particular case would be superfluous.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair has not held it. If the Chair is going to rule that way, he has to rule for the record, not by inference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled for the record that in this case the automatic call goes. [Applause.] The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 82, answered "present" 0, not voting 104, as follows:

There was no objection.

CONTINUING JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a privileged resolution (H. Res. 414), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is discharged from further consideration of H. J. Res. 323, "To amend a joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, etc.," constituted and organized under S. J. Res. 60, public resolution 25, Sixty-fourth Congress, approved July 20, 1916, and immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the said joint resolution shall be in order for consideration and shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that the first reading of the joint resolution shall be dispensed with, and there shall be not exceeding one hour of general debate to be confined to the subject matter of the joint resolution, one half to be controlled by those favoring the resolution and the other half to be controlled by those opposing it. That at any time during said general debate amendments may be offered, and at the conclusion of said general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon said joint resolution and all pending amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Committee on Rules has no jurisdiction to report this rule, it never having been referred to the committee by the House.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will have to agree to the gentleman's suggestion. The original resolution was referred, and I was only copying the resolution as amended, reporting the substitute. If the gentleman insists——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk be considered in lieu of the original resolution.

Mr. MANN. Well, I object. Let the Committee on Rules follow the rules of the House.

Mr. HENRY. This is just an oversight. The committee adjourned at 12 o'clock, and I did not have time to drop it into the basket.

Mr. MANN. Well, this is not the last day of the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution in this form——

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman does, I will make the point of order that the committee have not authorized him to do it.

Mr. HENRY. They have authorized me——

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought to have followed the directions of the committee in the beginning.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the committee authorized me to report the resolution, No. 414, which was referred to the Committee on Rules, with an amendment striking out the words beginning in line 15—

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]—

And to insert as an amendment, after the word "by"—

Those favoring the resolution and the other half to be controlled by those opposing it.

So I offer the resolution with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 414 (H. Rept. 1250).

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is discharged from further consideration of H. J. Res. 323, "To amend a joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, etc.," constituted and organized under S. J. Res. 60, public resolution 25, Sixty-fourth Congress, approved July 20, 1916, and immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the said joint resolution shall be in order for consideration and shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that the first reading of the joint resolution shall be dispensed with, and there shall be not exceeding two hours of general debate to be confined to the subject matter of the joint resolution, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. That at any time during said general debate amendments may be offered, and at the conclusion of said general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon said joint resolution and all pending amendments.

Mr. HENRY. Now, the amendments, Mr. Speaker, striking out certain language and inserting other language, beginning in line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution by striking out the words "the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]," and inserting the words "those favoring the resolution and the other half to be controlled by those opposing it."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer that resolution which the committee authorized to be reported, and I want to say that I have been so crowded that I have not had a moment to get to the basket to drop the substitute into it. I had it rewritten for the convenience of the House, but the gentleman from Illinois is technically correct, and I now offer the resolution which the committee authorized.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means that he reports the resolution. He does not offer it.

Mr. HENRY. I offer the resolution.

Mr. MANN. He has no authority to offer it. He has authority to report a resolution which has been referred to the committee.

Mr. HENRY. I offer the report of the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas is not the whole committee. That is what I am trying to emphasize.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the words "two hours" be stricken out and that the words "one hour" be inserted, so that we may have one hour of discussion on the resolution instead of two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to change the two hours to one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, how much time is going to be consumed in the discussion of the rule?

Mr. HENRY. I have no desire to limit the discussion. How much does the gentleman think ought to be allowed?

Mr. MANN. I do not know, but I suppose there ought to be some time, either upon the rule or the resolution itself.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Kansas asked for 20 minutes. He said he thought it would be sufficient for his side.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much time is desired on the resolution. I should think that those opposed to the resolution probably would want more than half an hour.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Kansas mentioned 20 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That was on the rule. I have had no request or intimation as to time on the resolution itself, and have asked for no time.

Mr. HENRY. I have no information on that. I do not know how much time those opposed to the resolution do wish.

Mr. RAYBURN. I should like 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] want 15 minutes on the rule or on the resolution?

Mr. RAYBURN. On the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Texas any suggestion?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I have not.

Mr. HENRY. I suggest 30 minutes. Fifteen minutes on a side will be enough on the rule.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is making his request about the resolution. I do not care how much time you have on the rule.

Mr. HENRY. My colleague is asking for time on the resolution.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want my time on the resolution, after the rule is adopted.

Mr. MANN. I think two hours' time is not too long, if gentlemen desire to use it on the resolution itself.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman says it is not too long?

Mr. MANN. I think it is not too long.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the request as to the time on the resolution, and I suggest 15 minutes to a side on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Let it go at 20. We will not use it if we do not need it.

Mr. HENRY. This is a very plain democratic rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is decidedly Democratic, but I did not know that it was so plain. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY. I did not suppose there would be any objection. I will agree to 20 minutes on a side for the rule, 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the other 20 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that debate on the rule be confined to 40 minutes, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kansas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I think the House is apprised of the contents of this special rule. It provides for the consideration of the Newlands commission resolution, which is investigating the transportation facilities of the country. It allows two hours' general debate, one hour to be given to those who favor the resolution and one hour to those who oppose it. It throws the resolution open to amendment, and at the end of that time the resolution is to be voted upon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain whether this has anything to do with the eight-hour question?

Mr. HENRY. It has not, as I understand it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is another committee investigating that matter now, is there?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia; I do not know about the other committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This rule refers to a bill or resolution by numbers. What I want to know is what you are driving at?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will take great pleasure in answering the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is proposed to be done?

Mr. ADAMSON. When the eight-hour law was passed it carried in it a provision for a commission to observe the effect of the eight-hour law on transportation. That is one proposition. This committee had already been raised for the general purpose of considering all questions connected with transportation in any form at home or abroad. This joint committee has been at work and done the best it could. Congress remained in session last fall longer than anybody expected, and we could not get to work until the 20th of November, giving us only a few days before Congress met. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania is aware, the five Members of the Senate and the five Members of the House of this committee are all under responsibility for legislation in their respective Houses. They could not serve in two places at once. They have not yet exhausted one-half of the work they were required to do. Seeing that they can not satisfactorily perform the duties of the investigation and at the same time go out and legislate, they decided to ask Congress for an extension of their authority.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, Senate joint resolution 60 is the resolution under which this committee is created?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the Adamson-Newlands commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is the Newlands commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I prefer to call it the Adamson-Newlands commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is very complimentary, but I yield to the great Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Senate joint resolution 60 is the resolution that followed the Adamson eight-hour law?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; it preceded it several months. In our investigation, if anybody thinks it is material to our investigation to consider the eight-hour law, they can do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The commission was created under Senate joint resolution 60?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And this present resolution has for its purpose the continuation of the committee work?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The commission has not finished its work yet?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas to let me ask what House joint resolution 323 is?

Mr. HENRY. Well, I will yield for that; but the only thing that astonishes me is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be asking for information. Generally he has it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We sought information yesterday of the gentleman from Texas, and we were obliged to ask several questions. This resolution discharges the Committee on Foreign Commerce from further consideration of House joint resolution 323?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the resolution offered by myself to extend the original resolution, Senate joint resolution 60.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The real purpose is to continue the commission already created?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. We were required to report next Monday, but we could not do it, and if the time is not extended we will waste all of the labor we have already put in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Adamson law provided for an investigation that was to be reported on about the 1st of January. Was this the commission that was to make that report?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is mistaken. It was not to report on the 1st of January; it was to begin on the 1st of January and observe the operation of the eight-hour law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The idea now is to allow this Newlands commission only to catch up with its work?

Mr. ADAMSON. It has no reference to the eight-hour question, but only to extend the time allowed for the Newlands committee, the joint investigation committee, to complete its work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania satisfied?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not thoroughly.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a rare thing in Washington to see the expiration of a commission. Once created, they die hard. I had hoped, after reading the Democratic platform of 1912, that we would see the expiration of one commission after another, in keeping with that plank which pledged the party to the elimination of useless offices.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to advise the gentleman that when I was instructed to offer this request for an extension the distinguished Republican members of the committee did not invoke the Democratic platform or any other, but unanimously voted that it was wise to ask for this extension.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, I assume that the Republican minority was willing to let the Democrats take all of the rope that they wanted——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is badly mistaken. The Republican members are taking a great deal of rope.

Mr. CAMPBELL. With the hope that the Democrats will hang themselves as early as possible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No; I can not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the committee has not even reported the resolution. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] stated that the committee unanimously favored the resolution. They could not even get enough members of the committee to favor a report upon the resolution, and the gentleman has not been able yet to even report it into the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will he yield to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman will have an hour in a short time, in which he can make all of the explanations he wishes to make about this resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON. But just at this point I do not care to explain the resolution, but the tangle that the gentleman is getting into with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, in addition to breathing additional life into a commission that is about to die, this resolution violates another pledge of the Democratic platform. It creates a job for a gentleman whose job will soon expire. This resolution, if agreed to at all, should provide that Members of Congress who are upon the pay rolls shall perform the duties of the commission, as was originally intended, and it ought not to create positions for gentlemen who retire from Congress, as the resolution does in its present form.

A great deal is said now about conserving the revenues of the Government. Certain metropolitan newspapers are frantic for fear the rest of the country may get some of the money in the Treasury—they want it all themselves. The amount in the Treasury is getting very low, and these little driblets ought to be guarded very carefully. The extension of this commission at a cost of $40,000 seems to me to be a useless expense. At the end of another year the country will know as much about the federalization of the railroads as it knows now. There are as many academic discussions of that subject in books and magazines and upon the lecture platform as there will be found in the report of the committee, which will never be read.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It will simply delay for a year important action on railway legislation that should be taken now. We should get rid of 48 commissions as soon as possible and require one to do the work.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed five minutes. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to consume his time now? If not, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I am ready for the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I have 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman does not want to use the time, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. HENRY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suggest that the gentleman do that in his own time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas declines to be interrogated.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas persists in calling this a commission. I do not think that is the proper designation of it. The resolution itself provides for the formation of a joint subcommittee, the Members of the Senate to be from a standing committee in the Senate and the Members of the House to be from a standing committee in the House. It is a joint subcommittee, as I understand it, and nothing but a subcommittee, to investigate every question covered by the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If it is a subcommittee of the two committees in the next Congress, ought it not to be composed of members of those two committees?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, to answer from the face of the resolution, I do not see how it could be formed in any other way. As far as the original resolution is concerned, that is existing law, but the pending resolution is an amendment to the extent of permitting a member on the committee who is now a member of the House committee to continue performing the duties pertaining to this subcommittee after his present term of office shall have expired.

Mr. MANN. He will be on the subcommittee of a committee when he can not be and will not be a member of it.

Mr. SIMS. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to be stating the facts correctly. He will not be a Member of the House and will not have a vote as a Member of the House, but for the purpose of investigating the subjects covered by the resolution, and having done part of the work, he might be better qualified than a Member of the House who is not familiar with the work; but I concede the force of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. This resolution is subject to amendment, as I understand. Mr. Speaker, I think in the present conditions it is necessary and important to finish this investigation.

We all remember that the President's recommendation was for a commission of experts or a commission which presumes themselves to be experts. Now, I think it is high time for the House of Representatives and the Senate to do some of their own investigating and be responsible for the facts they develop and be responsible for the reports they make on the floor of their respective Houses. These commissions of experts know how to do one thing well, and that is how to bring out all of the information on one side and how to withhold all of it on the other side. It seems that experts nearly always testify favorably to the side that summons them. That has been my experience in having experts before committees of which I have been a member several times. Experts seemingly with equal opportunity to have accurate knowledge of the facts come in and testify that the results of proposed legislation will be exactly opposite, in effect——

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman talks about this committee for the information of the House. What became of the hearings if any have been printed? Somebody told me there were 2,000 copies of the hearings printed each day. Is that true?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know.

Mr. RAYBURN. The Chairman says there are 1,000 printed. I have never found a Member of Congress yet who has received a copy through the mail or in any other way, but I understand that they are being used in plate matter all over the country, which is also using the utterances of Mr. Thom. It seems to me if this information is for Members of Congress the Members should get hold of it once in a while.

Mr. SIMS. I am surprised at what the gentleman from Texas has said. I did not know that Members of Congress are not receiving them. I know they ought to receive them. And if there are 1,000 copies, the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate should be first supplied before anybody else is supplied with them. That is my individual judgment. If the chairman of the committee has not sent the hearings to the Members, he should have done it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says he sends them to everybody who wants them, and therefore if anybody in the House wants them and will notify the chairman of the committee they will no doubt get them.

Mr. Speaker, this investigation has gone on to a certain extent, and that is to the extent that those who own the railroads and favor the legislation which they advocate have placed their statements before the committee. Of course, they expect to back up these propositions by introducing experts in the future. This official information is now available, but the other side, or those who oppose it, have not had an opportunity to be heard. And as a member of the committee I want to hear both sides to every question and give those who oppose and those who propose a fair opportunity to set before the committee everything they wish to state. And if this investigation is stopped now the effect will be to have a partial investigation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORLAND). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that there will be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, so far as the rule itself is concerned, it is fair and I do not oppose it upon that ground. But I am not in favor of the resolution to which it relates, and if the House should be of that same opinion it will save two hours' time of the House if this rule be voted down and thus dispose of the question.

I am opposed to the resolution, Mr. Speaker, because for one reason the committee to whom it has been referred and before whom it is pending has never made a report to this House upon it. The rule proposes to discharge that committee from the consideration of this resolution, and we to-day have not the benefit of the views of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at all upon this question. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolution itself, because I believe the time has come when in the creation of commissions or committees to investigate matters there should be some way of limiting those investigations to facts rather than to securing the opinions and conclusions of whoever may think he has some views upon any question before that commission or committee. And if this committee is created and is to be extended for one year, judging from what has already appeared before that committee, we can naturally expect 14 or 15 volumes of alleged testimony containing the views and opinions of all sorts of men in the United States, with practically no facts that will be of any benefit whatever to Members of Congress. I say that because, judging from what has already taken place before that committee, there is little if anything that has appeared in those hearings that was not already available to every Member of Congress if he chose to look for it. Practically all of the testimony before that committee has been opinions of men that had already appeared in books and magazines—their conclusions, but very few, if any, facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is the province and business of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in this House, by subcommittee or otherwise, to investigate these various questions, and if they want facts, and I assume they do, rather than opinions of men which they can get without such a commission as this, the place to go for it is a department of the Government, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has abundant facts upon every phase of these questions, and if we desire recommendations to aid that committee in coming to conclusions, let us ask for the recommendation of a public, impartial, expert body of men, the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon these various questions.

Reference has also been made to the fact that one member of this committee retires on the 4th day of March, and yet this resolution proposes to continue him as a member of this committee when he will not be a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress. Mr. Speaker, so far as expert knowledge is concerned, I will undertake to say that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the next member [Mr. SIMS], the ranking member [Mr. ESCH], upon this side, and the next member [Mr. HAMILTON], all of whom have been Members of Congress for a great many years, most of whom have been members of this Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for many years, are better qualified to-day to form a judgment as to what they think ought to be done with reference to these questions than any witnesses that will appear before that committee giving their opinions and conclusions of what ought to be done. And the result is going to be, if this resolution be adopted, that we will have 14 or 15 volumes of testimony, meaning an expenditure not of $40,000, as provided in this resolution, but $100,000 or more, for the printing of testimony that few Members of Congress probably will ever read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have to take what comes. The action of the House yesterday forced the Committee on Rules to meet, and I am glad there is something that can call the Committee on Rules together, though it produces this unfortunate result. The Committee on Rules has reported a good many rules to the House with reference to various pieces of legislation, but heretofore even that distinguished committee, with our beloved friend its chairman, has not undertaken to ask the House to consider a matter where the committee itself, having the matter before it, refused to consider it. We get rule after rule brought into the House from the Committee on Rules because the chairman of some appropriation committee asks for a rule making in order something which is reported by the committee of which he is the chairman. But up to date it has not been the practice of the Committee on Rules to itself determine whether legislation ought to be passed or not. They wait until a committee has reported it. But in this case just what the pipe-line connection is I do not know. Nobody stands sponsor, no committee stands sponsor, for the resolution which is proposed to be considered. This resolution was introduced in the House in December. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce asked unanimous consent in December to have it considered. Objection was made. The request was made again in this month. Objection was again made. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has not been absent. Its members are here. But they have not met to report the resolution.

How does it happen, then, that the chairman or some Member of the House can introduce a resolution to have the Committee on Rules discharge a committee and bring before the House a matter which the committee will not consider? If the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce favors the resolution, why have not they reported it? Why has the Committee on Rules undertaken to say, without a report of the proper legislative committee, what shall be considered by the House? That is assuming a power which the Committee on Rules has no right to arrogate to itself. A Member of the House introduces a proposition of legislation. It goes to the appropriate committee, and he ought not to expect to get consideration in the House through the Committee on Rules, and not through the committee to which the matter is referred. The Committee on Rules may be a useful adjunct, but here it tries to be the whole thing. [Laughter.]

Well, I am glad, at least, that it is the Committee on Rules that is trying to be the whole thing and not the chairman, as was apparently the case a few days ago. [Laughter.] That is one good result. I think we ought to vote down the rule. The primary purpose of the rule, the primary purpose of the resolution, is to take care of a "lame duck." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Texas wish to use some time now?

Mr. HENRY. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished leader on our side of the House said that this was the worst that had come out of the Committee on Rules, and the minority members of the Committee on Rules agree with him. But, more than that, we can not hold out the hope that this is the worst that will come out, because we anticipate that before the 1st of March there will be rules that will come out of our committee alongside of which this will seem conservative. So I can not even comfort the distinguished gentleman from Illinois with the illusions of hope. [Laughter.]

What does this rule do? In the first place, it performs a Cæsarean operation on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [laughter] and takes from it a resolution through which it has a perfect right to show its parturitive ability by itself delivering. [Renewed laughter.]

In the second place, it kills a very excellent bill. I refer to H. R. 563, introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce unanimously on March 14, 1916, entitled "A bill to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes," and if you will pass this rule and then the resolution, and thus continue this joint subcommittee—and in deference to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] I call attention to the fact that it is not a subcommittee on joints [laughter]—if you continue this joint subcommittee, you will have postponed for years the exercise of the authority of Congress to prevent the issues of watered stock and bad securities in those States which now have no laws which forbid such issues.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For a question.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman stated that this is a remarkable rule. I judge that he made that statement because it proposes to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill and bring it up in the House. Is that his reason?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Does the gentleman recall——

Mr. BENNET. I do.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman will let me ask the question, will he not?

Mr. BENNET. The Vreeland Act in the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Where the subcommittee stated what the bill should be, and what we should vote on, without the power of amendment?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; and I also recall what the people did to us in the fall after that. [Laughter.] And you are traveling the same road, with the same kind of rules.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. We are allowing all manner of amendments here, with full discussion. There was not any request for longer discussion.

Mr. BENNET. I did not yield to the gentleman. The gentleman's statement is correct, although his conduct is not. [Laughter.]

Now, there is not one single argument that can be made in favor of either this rule or the resolution. Why, this committee has been in existence five and one-half months. I am reliably informed that they have examined one witness wholly and seven partially in five and one-half months, and that they asked one gentleman, one distinguished railroad gentleman, a question, and at the end of two weeks he was still answering that question. [Laughter.] Well, just think of the number of railroads there are, the number of witnesses they can call, the number of labor unions there are, the number of civic organizations there are, the number of boards of trade there are, and what will be stirred up to come before this committee! Oh, it is an awfully hard thing to stop a commission. I was on one myself once, and it took two acts of Congress to put us out. [Laughter.]

If you do this foolish thing to-day and take this bill away from a committee that will not report it, and do the other things that I have mentioned, you will regret it as long as you live. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the turn affairs have taken here to-day. For some reason gentlemen on that side seem inclined to criticize the Committee on Rules, and have made some allusions to our conduct. They have made some reference to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] for not calling his committee together to pass on this resolution. They should be more considerate. The gentleman from Georgia has been to Georgia attending to affairs more important. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is no reason for the criticisms that these gentlemen make. Here is a joint resolution providing for the continuation of an important work, and gentlemen speak of this rule as being extreme. There is nothing very unusual about it. This thing has been done before, and will be done again. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ADAMSON] came before the Committee on Rules, and so did the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], one of the senior members of that committee, and asked that their committee be discharged from further consideration of this joint resolution, to which there did not seem to be any objection, except by one or two members.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. With reference to the construction of the rule?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If any Member gets the floor under this rule, stating he is in favor of the resolution, he is entitled to an hour's time, is he not?

Mr. HENRY. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And any gentleman who gets the floor stating he is opposed to the resolution is entitled to an hour's time?

Mr. HENRY. Undoubtedly, I think.

Mr. MANN. When could anybody else offer an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. HENRY. I am willing to amend the rule so that you can offer amendments as freely as you please. I think under its terms they can be offered.

Mr. MANN. It says at any time during the general debate amendments may be offered. I take it a Member can not offer an amendment unless he gets recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want——

Mr. MANN. I am trying to get a construction of the rule.

Mr. HENRY. I think amendments can be offered. I do not want to quibble about it, and if that is not satisfactory to the gentleman I am willing to yield enough time to him to perfect it, so that gentlemen can have no misunderstanding about it; or, after I get through, I think he can get it by unanimous consent, if he wants it, because I do not wish to move the previous question——

Mr. MANN. I thought if we could have an understanding——

Mr. HENRY. Let us have an understanding, then.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state what my purpose was. I do not know whether that can be considered or not.

Mr. HENRY. We will have an understanding. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Georgia for a moment. What understanding does the gentleman from Illinois wish about the offering of amendments?

Mr. MANN. I think anyone ought to have the privilege of offering amendments, and not have the right to do so dependent upon having the gentleman who has control of the time yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I intended.

Mr. MANN. I think that ought to be the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask both gentlemen a question. This rule provides that the Adamson resolution shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Now, that being the case, how does it come that any gentleman gets an hour?

Mr. ADAMSON. That refers to only the first hour.

Mr. MANN. It may be that they do not.

The SPEAKER. Without deciding the question positively, the Chair is rather inclined to think that any gentleman getting the floor will be entitled to five minutes.

Mr. MANN. If that is the understanding, it is satisfactory.

Mr. HENRY. I do not object to that.

Mr. MANN. Of course, there is no such thing as general debate in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I was seeking to get a construction of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is suggesting that to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. I think the five-minute rule would apply. I do not think there would be any trouble about that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that this is not an extreme rule. The Committee on Rules tried to be as liberal as possible about it, because apparently there is not much controversy over this joint resolution, and it seemed that it was the general understanding in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that it was necessary to continue the work of this joint committee. Gentlemen speak about some present Member of Congress being continued on this committee after his term expires. Do you not recall the Aldrich Commission, which reported the Aldrich bill to Congress? If I remember correctly, there were several gentlemen whose terms had expired who continued to serve on that commission, and the bill was finally reported and the report of the commission was filed with Congress, although perhaps several years had expired. You passed the Vreeland-Aldrich emergency measure, and then that commission went ahead with its work and reported to Congress. You gentlemen did that. You did not seem to think there was anything wrong about it; and if to-day some Member who is familiar with this question is continued on this committee, where he can do a good service for Congress and for the country, I do not think that any gentleman should make objection; and in my opinion I do not know of anyone better qualified to serve on this committee than the gentleman whom some of you have in mind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that during the remainder of this session we will not hear any more criticism of the Committee on Rules, and especially of the chairman of the committee. We try to be liberal. I know that we are fair, and I am sure that we do no unusual or extreme thing. If you gentlemen will so regulate your conduct as not to make it necessary to bring in these rules we will have better rules for the House; but if you do not, what we have done up to date may not be all that will be accomplished by the Committee on Rules during the remainder of this session.

I have heard a great many discussions on the floor of the House, but this morning I have heard less said of real merit pertaining to the questions in controversy than ever I have heard before during my service. Every gentleman who spoke talked about everything except the question before us, and they all know it. They were only endeavoring to play politics. Now, if you are going to play politics, select something of importance upon which to go to the country, and do not pick up such questions as you brought before the House yesterday, without any facts, and this matter here to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is dying hard.

Mr. MANN. "Still harping on my daughter!"

Mr. HENRY. Oh, Mr. Speaker, pick out something of real merit and we are ready to meet you. Speaking about dying hard, every one of you knows that the Republican Party has already died, and it deserved to die. Why, you are not united even now. I have seen some hint in the papers that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] threw a brick at some one else instead of at the chairman of the Committee on Rules yesterday. He is interviewed once in a while and raises these partisan questions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution is fair and it ought to be adopted.

I move the previous question on the rule and the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question on the rule and the amendment to the final passage.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENRY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division. Pending the division——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not get an automatic call if he makes the point now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to count. Then he can get it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum, because I think the Democrats ought to be here.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 103.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-nine Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will send for absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering the previous question will answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 168, nays 140, answered "present" 2, not voting 123, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7367. An act to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Francis River at or near intersections of sections 13, 14, 23, and 24, township 15 north, range 6 east, in Craighead County, Ark.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. JONES and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of the Interior.

The message also announced that the President had, on December 27, 1916, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 7095. An act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved the 24th day of August, 1912; and

S. 6116. An act providing for the taxation of the lands of the Winnebago Indians and the Omaha Indians in the State of Nebraska.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. Pending that, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa how much time he desires in general debate, if any?

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to have one hour upon this side.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by myself and one by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is now nearly half after 3 o'clock. Suppose we should have an understanding that this time be used this afternoon and that we will not read the bill for amendment to-day, but will meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad, indeed, to enter into such an understanding, and will agree that we shall rise at the conclusion of general debate to-day, and I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. CONRY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19359, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is one patriotic body which is devoting itself to the perpetuation of the great landmarks of American history—the Daughters of the American Revolution. The scope of their work is not confined to the stirring scenes and incidents of the War for American Independence, but embraces the victories, both of war and peace, by which the infant Nation gathered the fruit of its successful revolution in the conquest of the continent.

Among these achievements of the past, which have resulted in extending American civilization and American ideals from Plymouth Rock to the Golden Gate, there has been no more potent force than those historic trails or primitive highways by which the American pioneer advanced to the conquest of the wilderness. [Applause.] The interest of the Daughters of the Revolution has centered in the preservation of these historic highways, linked not by accident but by the hand of fate into a continuous route of travel from the infant settlements on the Atlantic coast to the Mississippi and into the great West.

The first link in the chain of nation building roads is the famous old Boston Post Road. On the 22d day of January, in the year 1673, the first mail upon the continent of America was dispatched from New York to Boston. The route lay by the way of New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Brookfield, Worcester, and Cambridge. In just two weeks after the departure of this first postman from New York he rode through Roxbury into Boston, delivered his mail in safety, and received congratulations on the wonderful progress of the age. The messenger could only stay two days in Boston, as he must hurry back in order to complete the round trip in a month. New York had only recently passed from the control of the Dutch into that of the English, and the Boston post marked the first regular communication by land between the English colonies. From New York to Mount Vernon we pass over "Washington's road," the route by which the first President traveled from his home to his inauguration. Coming up from the south is the Braddock Road, which also takes us back to the "good old colony days." The Braddock Road really began at Portsmouth, Va., and extended to the headwaters of the first streams which found their way into the Ohio. It was the beginning of the English expansion westward, the first step of which was to dislodge the French from the Ohio Valley. In October, 1753, George Washington was commissioned by the governor of Virginia, in company with Gist, to make his way over the Allegheny Mountains into the valley of the Monongahela to warn the French commander not to trespass upon English soil. He made this trip through an unknown country overrun with hostile savages who had been inflamed against the English and into the very heart of a wild region dominated by the French forts. After performing his duty with his usual quiet courage he returned to Virginia and made his report. His report indicated that England would have to fight for the possession of the Ohio Valley. The next year, 1754, he led a company over the same route and fought the French at Great Meadows. By the following year, 1755, the British Government had been aroused to the gravity of the situation and dispatched Gen. Braddock to the Colonies. Washington accompanied Braddock on his ill-fated and mismanaged expedition and suffered in the general defeat.

After the Revolution had ended and the independence of the Colonies had been achieved the disintegrating force of local and sectional feeling almost wrecked the hopes of the patriots who had laid the foundation of the infant Republic. Washington and those who shared his breadth of view realized that only the powerful bond of commercial intercourse and mutual interest would hold the Union of States together. Hence the convention for the formation of the present Constitution of the United States resulted directly from a call for the convention to form closer commercial relations between the Colonies. The new States must be linked together by highways of commerce for prosperity in peace and protection in war. The dominant note of the constitutional convention was that interstate commerce and all of its means and agencies were matters of national concern, vital to the life and growth of the Republic.

The first movement toward the expansion of frontier life across the Alleghenies led to the opening up of the highway reaching from the Atlantic seaboard into the headwaters of the first streams emptying into the tributaries of the Ohio. The most natural route of travel was Washington's and Braddock's Road of colonial days, and hence it became established as the first outlet for the surplus energy of the young Nation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice that on that map the State of Michigan is of the same color as Canada. Is not Michigan in the United States?

Mr. BORLAND. I think that was done in deference to the State of Michigan going dry. We have given them the white ribbon. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The rest of the map is yellow.

Mr. BORLAND. That is a mark of distinction, I will say to my friend from Michigan. He certainly can not object to the pure white that we have given to his State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So that it belongs to the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. When the Americans began to pour across the Alleghenies and plant their homes in the great wilderness of the Mississippi Valley, a grave peril arose that those distant settlements would lose touch, politically and commercially, with their brethren of the Atlantic seaboard. In fact, a great feeling of discontent and unrest arose among the southwestern settlers at what they regarded as the neglect and injustice of the General Government. They could not ship their products to the eastern seaboard, and yet they were expected to pay their taxes and export their goods by that route. They had no protection from the Indians, the Spaniards, or the British, and yet they were expected to remain loyal to the Federal Government and be the guardians of its frontier.

Their natural outlet of commerce led to the Spanish dominions by way of the Ohio and Mississippi, and the siren song of the Spaniard was always in their ears that the path of commercial prosperity for them was under the red and yellow banner of Castile. This danger and discontent led to the first great effort of national expansion when Jefferson acquired the Louisiana Purchase, and put both banks of the Mississippi River under the sovereignty of the United States. But the problems of development, and even those of safety, could not be solved without national highways.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. I shall be glad to.

Mr. FESS. We are all wonderfully impressed with the gentleman's eloquent presentation of this thoroughfare. The gentleman has referred to the early discontent. The portion of our country once called western North Carolina, that we now call Tennessee, was so dissatisfied that the people there organized a new State——

Mr. BORLAND. The State of Franklin.

Mr. FESS. And called it Franklin, elected John Sevier as governor, and their legislature made overtures to join Spain——

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is history.

Mr. FESS. In order to get an outlet, and it was through Washington's suggestion of this means of communication that that first great State was saved to the Union.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no question about that.

Jefferson was fortunate in having in his Cabinet the first good-roads enthusiast among American statesmen, Albert Gallatin.

Gallatin was a man of education and accomplishments, and the society of the gay capital of Richmond had great attractions for him. Nevertheless, in 1784, he crossed the Alleghenies to Monongahela County, Pa., to establish a home in the wilderness. It was supposed by his friends that he had buried himself and ruined a brilliant career, but out of that wilderness he created the mighty Commonwealth which, recognizing his genius as a constructive statesman, made him successively a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, a leader in Congress, a Senator of the United States, a member of the Cabinet, and the greatest figure in American financial history. It was in the wilderness that he first met George Washington. Washington was seeking, with the aid of Indian guides, the most practicable route for a main highway across the mountains. After a day's exploring he had come to a hut in which Gallatin and other men were living, and was using Gallatin's rude bunk for a table while he made those elaborate notes of his doings which were so characteristic of Washington. Gallatin in the meantime was lying on the floor, having been evicted from his bunk. As Washington laboriously went over the reports of the different routes, Gallatin, then a young man of about 18, and with a mind that worked with the speed of lightning, jumped up and exclaimed, "That is the only route." He says that Washington slowly took off his horned spectacles and gave him a look of severe disapproval in utter silence. After Washington had gone over the reports for over another hour, he finally turned to Gallatin, took off his spectacles again, and said, "Young man, you are right."

Gallatin was the real father of the Cumberland Road, although in later years Henry Clay managed to identify himself very thoroughly with its construction. The Cumberland Road was begun in 1806 by an act of Congress signed by Thomas Jefferson.

Under the leadership of the great Pennsylvanian Jefferson recommended and Congress inaugurated the first great national highway.
